No election deal: Mordechai

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — The Centre party leadership this week reiterated its commitment to support Yitzhak Mordechai's candidacy for prime minister.

"We are nobody's subsidiary party, and we'll meet on the18th of May," Mordechai said, at a Tel Aviv press conference designed to revive the Centre party's failing campaign.

The party's top four leaders criticized the media's rumor-mongering regarding Mordechai's intention to quit the premiership race and support Barak. The four blamed Barak and the media for conducting a campaign of misinformation aimed at undermining Mordechai's candidacy.

They attacked the media for reporting on a Barak-Mordechai deal, despite the Centre party's repeated denials of such collaboration. They accused the media of creating news rather then reporting it.

The party's leaders also emphasized the importance of a strong Centre party in the Knesset, irrespective of who becomes prime minister, in order to break the current lock the haredi parties have on the political system.

They launched a blistering attack on Shas leader Aryeh Deri, saying they would not enter into coalition negotiations with a man who was recently sentenced to a four-year jail term.

'The world is no longer silent'

By ELIAS LEVY

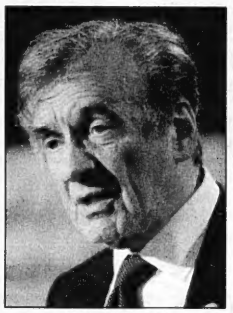
MONTREAL — Renowned writer, Nobel Peace Prize winner, talmudist, philosopher, advocate for human rights, Elie Wiesel is one of the great intellectual and humanistic figures of our time.



Elie Wiesel

A survivor of the Auschwitz and Buchenwald extermination camps, Wiesel has spent 40 years fighting racism, exclusion of minorities and totalitarianism.

On Holocaust Remembrance Day, April 13, Wiesel was the guest of honor of President Bill Clinton, at the White House. In his talk on The Dangers of Indifference, which attracted considerable attention, Wiesel analyzed the stakes in the current crisis in Kosovo, and once again warned humanity against the historic amnesia of memory.

On May 28, the Université de Montréal will honor Wiesel with a doctorate honoris causa.

Immersion in Israel

TORONTO — At least 25 Toronto Jewish high school students will take part in a unique immersion program this summer at Ulpan Akiva in Netanya. Participants will experience complete immersion in Israeli culture and society by touring the country accompanied by soldiers, encountering Israeli high school students, learning Hebrew and attending seminars with public figures. The program runs July 5 to 31. For details, call program organizer Itia Golan at 905-886-6770 or the Israel Experience office at 398-6931.

Holocaust Course Funded

VANCOUVER — Thanks to a local Holocaust survivor, funding has been set up to provide a permanent course on the Holocaust at the University of British Columbia. The new Sophie Waldman Endowment for Holocaust Education will allow UBC to begin a course in September 2000.

ISRAEL

Foreign Minister Visits

JERUSALEM — Improved Israeli-Russian relations would serve the interests of both countries, Russian Foreign Minister Igor Ivanov said upon arriving in Israel last month. Ivanov's visit has prompted some critics to suggest that his presence was calculated to win votes for Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu from immigrants from the former Soviet Union.

Poll: Race a Tie

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Labor Party leader Ehud Barak are running virtually neck and neck in the race for prime minister, according to an opinion poll published last month. The survey, conducted by Gallup and published in Ma'ariv, showed that Netanyahu would receive 36 percent of the vote if the May 17 election were held now, while Barak would receive 34 percent. Yitzhak Mordechai trailed with 11 percent.

WORLD

Gunman Had Jewish Roots

LITTLETON, Colo. — One of the Littleton gunmen who traded Nazi salutes with fellow "Trenchcoat Mafia" members was the great-grandson of a prominent Jewish philanthropist in Columbus, Ohio. The Jewish Community Centre in Columbus is named after Leo Yassenoff, great-grandfather of Dylan Klebold, who along with Eric Harris opened fire in their suburban Denver high school April 20, killing 12 students and one teacher before killing themselves. While Klebold was raised a Lutheran, he reportedly read the Four Questions at a Passover seder this year, and his mother was raised in a Jewish home, family members have said.

Survivors Mark Escape

ZAGREB — Holocaust survivors gathered recently at a former concentration camp in Croatia to commemorate an escape attempt. In 1945, 600 inmates broke out of their barracks in the Jasenovac camp. Only 70 escaped, and the others were shot to death. The survivors called for a guilty sentence to be imposed on the camp's commander, Dinko Sakic, who was extradited to Croatia last June and is being tried for crimes against humanity.

Report Accuses Banks

WASHINGTON — French banks stole billions of dollars from Jews and other groups during World War II and then transferred the money to North Africa, according to a 1943 CIA report. The partial release of the report by the World Jewish Congress comes as the group is stepping up its pressure on European banks to settle claims dating from the Holocaust era.

New Move On Crosses

WARSAW — The Polish Senate has amended a law, allowing for the removal of 200 crosses that have been placed near the site of the Auschwitz death camp in the past year. The amendment would let stand a large cross erected near Auschwitz that was used in a 1979 mass by Pope John Paul II. The amendment now heads to the Parliament's lower house.

Memorial Unveiled

YEREVAN, Armenia — Members of the Jewish community of Yerevan last month unveiled a memorial to victims of the Holocaust. Leader Rima Varzhapetian, said the community will also plant two fir trees to memorialize the victims of the 1915 genocide of Armenians. There are between 300 and 400 Jewish families in Armenia today.

De Rothschild Dies

NEW YORK — Baroness Batsheva de Rothschild, a patron of Israeli dance, died last month in her home following a long illness. She was 84. Born in Paris, de Rothschild moved to the United States with her family following the outbreak of World War II and immigrated to Israel in 1962. Two years later, she founded the Batsheva Dance Company. Through her ties with noted choreographers, she helped the troupe attain international standing. In 1967, de Rothschild founded the Batdor Ballet Academy, and remained active in its management until the weeks preceding her death.

Holocaust Memorial Features Swedish Envoy

FREDERICTON — This year's annual interfaith Holocaust memorial service here featured Sweden's ambassador to Canada describing an international co-operative effort designed to memorialize the victims of the Holocaust, and educate current and future generations about its lessons.

Jan Olof Tahl described the Swedish Living History Project on the Holocaust, which brings together Sweden, Great Britain and the United States. Launched in 1997, the project includes a wide range of activities, including the publishing of the book Tell Ye Your Children... some 900,000 copies of which have been sent on request to parents of schoolchildren or distributed to schools, libraries, seniors' organizations and private individuals. The book presents facts about the Holocaust and attempts to explain how the unimaginable became reality. Stahl brought copies for distribution.

Memorial candles were kindled by survivors and in memory of the 1.5 million Jewish children who perished; while James Stewart of St. Andrews, N.B., a Royal Air Force veteran who had been imprisoned in Buchenwald, lit a candle in memory of Canadian veterans who died in World War II.

Tragedy Has Struck

An extraordinary woman in our community—a 50 year old, single mother of 10 children, has tragically passed away after a serious illness.

Her modest salary as a secretary for one of our local Jewish Day Schools, allowed her to barely cover the basic family expenses, let alone the cost of expensive medical treatment and nursing care.

The children have been left with about $200k in debts and no further means of financial support. Funds are required for basic necessities such as food, clothing, housing and Jewish education.

The family desperately wants to stay together, with the older children taking on the responsibility of raising and ultimately marrying off the younger ones and themselves.

We appeal to you to support our community's efforts to establish a trust fund for these children. All cheques over $10 will receive charitable tax receipts. In the spirit of Jewish compassion and generosity at this holiday time, please open your hearts and donate generously. Thank you.

Report urges changes to Quebec school system

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A report now before Quebec's education minister calls for an end to the historic privileges of Catholics and Protestants in the public school system, the secularization of all schools, and the elimination of religious instruction, as such, during school hours.

A guiding principle of the report is that any policy adopted by the Quebec government on the question of religion in schools must be based on the principles of equality and state neutrality.

While the recommendations would mean radical change, particularly for Catholics, the recommendations may inadvertently have the effect of greater exposure to religious content, especially to Christianity, than most Jewish students in the public system today are used to.

The report, written by a task force chaired by Université de Montréal professor Jean-Pierre Proulx, proposes that the study of religions, from a cultural and secular perspective, be made compulsory for all students at the elementary and high school levels.

Students would be encouraged to look at world religions, and especially those present in Quebec, from "a social sciences viewpoint," in order to gain a "better understanding of the background behind the central message of each religion."

The goal would be to foster an appreciation of religious diversity, and to contribute to "the building of a common civic space" respectful of personal religious choices.

While the authors of the report stress that such study must be neutral, they also emphasize that "a prominent place" be given to Christian traditions.

"Christianity should be given a prominent place in the study of religions, given its profound impact on the western world and part of the eastern world," the report states. "Its influence is manifest in all fields of human activity. Literature, music, art, architecture and politics are but a few examples."

They said, giving Christianity prominence is justified because Catholicism and Protestantism have played a major role in Quebec's history and its social and cultural life.

"Catholicism will be given the attention it warrants as the religion of the great majority of Quebecers throughout Quebec's history, and as the cultural matrix which shaped Quebec as a society."

It is also recommended that schools make their facilities available outside school hours, to all religious groups that wish, at their own expense, to provide religious programming to students.

Although school boards based on denomination – Catholic or Protestant – were abolished last July and replaced by language-based ones, individual schools continue to have the right to designate themselves as Catholic, Protestant or secular, according to parents' wishes.

Almost all schools in Quebec continue to have Catholic or Protestant status, although the latter have been essentially neutral for many years, and the former continue to teach Catholicism as part of the curriculum. The Protestant schools' "Protestant" instruction is described as non-denominational and eschewing doctrine.

However, with the reorganization of the school boards, all schools are required by law to offer students three choices: Catholic, Protestant or secular moral education. In theory, other religions may seek their own classes, but schools are not obligated to provide them.

The change to language-based boards, as it now stands, also means Jewish students could find themselves in English, but Catholic schools.

The report concludes, after consultation with legal experts, that the present school system is discriminatory because of the advantages accorded Catholics and Protestants. It also concludes that the system violates both the Canadian and Quebec human rights charters' guarantees of equality and freedom of religion, and possibly Canada's international commitments.

To create linguistic boards, Section 93 of the 1867 Constitution Act was amended to repeal the application in Quebec of denominational rights in schooling.

Legally, the current situation can only exist by Quebec's invoking the notwithstanding clause, a measure that must be reviewed every five years. A decision to renew must be made this June.

The Proulx committee was mandated by then education minister Pauline Marois to study the place of religion in the schools in light of these changes. The result, after 1½ years' work, is this 270-page report, Religion in Secular Schools: A New Perspective for Quebec. It is intended to serve as a

The unity of whole numbers

In less than two weeks, Israel votes. The campaign is down to its final few days. Political commercials started airing last week on Israeli TV, signalling the fevered and frenzied dash by the main parties and the contending prime ministerial candidates down the stretch run.

The airwaves in Israel are now thick with political messages.

On the cover of this issue we have displayed a collage of six of the very first party commercials that appeared on Israeli television. There is also in this issue an essay by David Goldberg, the director of research and education for the Canada Israel Committee, on some of the similarities and differences between the Israeli and the Canadian political systems.

Despite the differences pointed out by Goldberg in his article, there is, indeed, one key similarity he politely did not mention.

The television messages currently being aired in Israel are like all other political messages aimed at capturing votes from a voting public in a democracy, namely, partisan puffery, negative imaging and cynical self-promotions. Thus, they are familiar to Canadians, too.

The 33 parties running in the Knesset elections, however, do not have unlimited air time to run their commercials. In total, they have 11½ hours of television air time until May 16, the day before the election.

Each party is allowed a precise amount of commercial time on TV, according to a formula which takes into account the number of Knesset members in their ranks.

But even though the parties have 11½ hours available to them, the viewing public will not necessarily be watching 11½ hours of paid political announcements.

Most viewers have cable TV. In this election, unlike previous elections, they can simply "click" away a political commercial.

And many viewers do.

In addition to TV air time, 26 hours have been allocated for election ads on the radio.

Thus, when one combines radio and television electioneering with that in the newspapers, and at workplaces, bus stops, supermarkets and coffee houses, there are very few pockets or spaces of quiet air left unfilled with politics and political commentary.

What is an interested observer of the Israeli elections, many thousands of kilometres away, to make of it all?

The only obviously accurate observation is that the intensity that characterizes Israeli life in general, also characterizes Israeli politics, to a degree that is not common here in Canadian life or Canadian politics.

This "intensity gap" adds to the challenges facing the Canadian Anglo-Jewish press in its coverage of life in Israel.

The CJN toes no political line; nor does it advocate any single approach to Jewish fulfilment. As we have written in this space on many occasions in the past, The CJN is committed by mandate and by practice to "serv[ing] the Jewish people in Canada, in Israel and in all its habitations."

We believe one of the highest imperatives of that service requires us, unceasingly, to toe only the line that stands for Jewish unity, and to advocate only the approach that best advances mutual respect and civility among diverse Jewish groups.

I am compelled, therefore, to express regret and disappointment that it appears so much of the political fare offered for viewing on Israeli television is not only antithetical to unity, mutual respect and civility, but actually appears calculated to divide Israelis into increasingly smaller and more fractious factions.

For example, a friend of mine in Israel described for me one of the Meretz party's commercials.

"A secular man is walking across the desert, panting, sweating, carrying a haredi on his back.

He finally throws the haredi fellow off his back and the music comes on: "Bekarov yihyeh poh tov." (Soon everything here will be good.)

Without denying the seriousness of the many issues between the haredim and the rest of Israeli society, the message in the Meretz commercial is quite obvious and quite obnoxious.

Equally obnoxious is the message maliciously cultivated by the Shas party in a videotape, in which criminally convicted party chair Aryeh Deri accuses the court system and "the elites" of having framed him in order to destroy both him and his party.

"There is a group," Deri says, "which...decided to establish a secular state in which it is forbidden to mention Torah, Judaism and the Sabbath. They took our youth by the hundreds of thousands, cut them off from the rabbis and the family, and took away their souls."

Though we are only observers of the Israeli election, it is still valid to say, even from the Diaspora, that we should be striving to mold Jewish groupings into stronger units of whole numbers.

They are exceedingly odious and even dangerous.

Golden urges government to tackle homelessness

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The commitment of volunteers at Congregation Darchei Noam and St. Peter's Roman Catholic church, who have teamed up to feed and clothe the homeless as part of the Out of the Cold program, is "just exemplary," said Anne Golden recently.

But volunteers cannot carry the burden alone, said the chair of Toronto Mayor Mel Lastman's Homelessness Action Task Force and president of United Way of Greater Toronto.

"I'm not sure the full impact of our findings has penetrated through all levels of government," said Golden, whose report on homelessness was issued four months ago. She spoke recently at Darchei Noam on Responding to Homelessness: Treating the Symptoms, or Fixing the System, at an evening honoring the Out of the Cold volunteers.

To solve the problem of homelessness, the focus must be on prevention, not reaction, said Golden. "We have to be focused on the causes of homelessness: poverty, mental illness and lack of affordable housing."

Unless we take serious action, she warned, the situation will continue to worsen.

Although homelessness statistics are higher than they sometimes appear – a 31,000-name waiting list for affordable housing actually represents 31,000 heads of families and thus 100,000 people – Golden views the report as "very positive" because of its prescription for strategies like creating more affordable housing, supportive housing for people with special needs, and ensuring a more equitable geographic distribution of low-cost housing and services.

"Homelessness is fixable. We don't have to have this, and we act as if we do."

The response cannot be just local, Golden emphasized. In every city studied, two-thirds of the homeless came from elsewhere, she noted.

Because of increasing rents, tens of thousands of affordable units are being lost, she said. "We need the federal government to get back into the housing business."

Golden's report called for 2,000 new, low-cost housing units a year. That figure was a compromise, she said. "We need a minimum of 4,000. We've never built more than 1,600 units in a year...and I was asked to prepare a report that was doable."

Countries like Israel, she noted, build 50,000 units a year. Two thousand would be "a big accomplishment" for Toronto, she said.

Governmental costs to implement the report's recommendations would amount to a fraction of a percent of the total budget, said Golden, noting also the moral imperative to take action.

"There are enormous costs implicit in doing nothing."

Rabbi Larry Pinsker, spiritual leader of Darchei Noam, also spoke, using Talmudic text to illustrate Jewish obligations with respect to the homeless population.

Palestinian terrorist set to appeal deportation ruling

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An Immigration adjudicator has ordered a Palestinian terrorist living in Brantford, Ont. to be removed from Canada for his role in an attack on an El Al airliner.

However, Mahmoud Mohammad Issa Mohammad plans to appeal the decision to the Immigration and Refugee Board's (IRB) appeal division, according to his lawyer, Barbara Jackman.

Jackman said the adjudicator erred in not considering Mohammad's case on humanitarian and compassionate grounds. If the IRB's appeal division grants the appeal, she will argue that Mohammad should be allowed to remain in Canada because of his lengthy "settlement" here, because his family is here and because the terrorist events took place 30 years ago.

"There is no evidence he has engaged in similar activities or would support similar activities now," she suggested.

Mohammad, 56, was ruled inadmissable to stay in Canada because of his membership in a terrorist organization and his role in terrorist activities.

In 1968, Mohammad was a member of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine when he participated in an attack on an El Al aircraft in Athens. He and an accomplice raked the plane with gunfire and grenades, killing an Israeli passenger.

He was found guilty of manslaughter and sentenced by a Greek court to 17 years in jail. In 1971, after serving less than one year of his sentence, he was pardoned and released, after other Palestinian terrorists hijacked a Greek plane and threatened to blow it up unless Mohammad and seven other Arabs were freed.

In 1987, Mohammad received a Canadian immigration visa by concealing his past. After he immigrated to Canada and received permanent residency status, his terrorist role was revealed and immigration authorities began efforts to deport him.

Over a decade ago, an immigration adjudicator ruled he could be deported because he had deliberately lied when he applied for permanent resident status by not admitting his criminal record.

Since then, his case has wound through the legal system, with a side trip to London, England. The RCMP was foiled in its attempt to remove him to North Africa when the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) and British intelligence objected during Mohammad's stopover in England. Mohammad returned to Canada and applied for refugee status.

Mohammad works as a contractor in the construction industry, is married and has three children.

Canadian Jewish Congress welcomed the decision to deport Mohammad. "If the international community is to be successful in eradicating terrorism there can be no moratorium on terrorists. By staying the course in regard to Mohammad, Canada has affirmed that terrorism will not be tolerated," said Congress president Moshe Ronen.

"Accepting [a refugee] claim from a convicted terrorist who lied upon entering Canada would have made a mockery of our refugee determination system," Ronen said. "Such flagrant abuse would tarnish Canada's reputation as a country prepared to do its share to fight terrorism while welcoming genuine asylum-seekers whose lives are at risk."

"We are satisfied that the Canadian legal system has worked effectively to achieve justice in this case," said Paul Michaels, director of communications for the Canada-Israel Committee. "We feel that Canada should never be a safe haven for terrorists."

"We are not going to give terrorists protection in Canada, no matter how long ago an act was committed," said Huguette Shouldice, a spokesperson for Immigration Canada.

New Village Shul to open

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Hundreds of people are expected to attend the grand opening of the new Village Shul, the first synagogue to open in the Bathurst-Eglinton area in many years.

The new 24,000-square-foot building is the culmination of the congregation's development from rented quarters at Beth Lida synagogue on Gilgorm Avenue, to the living room of spiritual leader Rabbi Yaakov Palatnik and on to a storefront on Eglinton Avenue.

Membership has grown from a nucleus of five families, who wanted to find a place they could be comfortable in after studying at Aish HaTorah, to 290 adults – this includes singles and both spouses of married couples.

Rabbi Palatnik moved to Forest Hill with his wife Lori and their children, to head up the project. The programs offered in partnership with Aish HaTorah, include the Jewish Family Institute, which applies the wisdom of Torah and psychology to such topics as raising children, and making good marriages; adult education classes; a Hebrew school; and a bat mitzvah course.

There are daily, Shabbat and holiday services, as well as alternative and instructional ones. A family service will be offered at the new facility.

The new building will also feature a youth chapel, a patio rooftop, an early childhood learning centre, a library with a fireplace, and a social hall. The main sanctuary will have separate side by side seating for men and women.

"The two sides will be equally able to see and hear everything that is going on on the bimah," said the rabbi.

A seven day a week women's mikvah will open in the not-too-distant future.

Rabbi Palatnik stressed that The Village Shul and its programs are "for the benefit of the whole community, not just for our members."

Celebrations for the opening of the new shul will begin May 7 with a banquet in the new social hall. The first service will be held on Shabbat, followed by a kiddush, and special lectures.

On May 9, the Torah scrolls will be paraded along Eglinton Avenue from the old shul to the new one, accompanied by a klezmer band, dancing and singing. Eglinton will be closed for the event.

Special guest will be Rabbi Noah Weinberg, dean and founder of Aish HaTorah in Jerusalem.

Rabbi Palatnik noted that major backers and supporters include Leslie Dan, Alan Berg and president Peter Friedman.

For more information, and membership inquiries, call The Village Shul at 785-1107.

White wolves

While still in the numbed aftermath of the murderous carnage committed in Littleton, Colo., by the two teenaged worshippers of Adolf Hitler, news came last weekend of the third hate-motivated bombing in three weeks on the streets of London, England.

Two people were killed and more than 70 were injured in the blast that ripped apart the Admiral Duncan pub in the Soho district of London. The pub was known to be a hangout for gays.

London police have tied this bombing to two previous bombings recently, one against Londoners of African-Caribbean descent in Brixton, south London and the other against Asian-Londoners in Brick Lane, east London.

A suspect was taken into custody within 48 hours. But, as the New York Times reported, "the arrest failed to quell widespread anxieties among minority groups that they may be the next target of what police depict as a hate-driven racial campaign by extreme rightists that has sent tremors of nervousness across London."

It is with good reason that the anxieties have not been quelled.

A new, extremist, right-wing, evil group called the White Wolves has apparently sprung from underneath the detritus and dark rocks of the gutter to claim responsibility for the latest attack.

"The White Wolves," reports the New York Times, "are said to be an offshoot of Combat 18 – which takes its name from the position of Adolf Hitler's initials in the alphabet – itself a violent breakaway group from rightist political organizations."

Along with other minorities in London, the Jewish community has been targeted by these latest neo-Nazi incarnations.

A week before the April 17 bombing in Brixton, someone issued the following public statement on behalf of the White Wolves: "Notice is hereby given that all non-whites and Jews (defined by blood, not religion) must permanently leave the British Isles before the year is out. Jews and non-whites who remain after 1999 has ended will be exterminated."

It is our fervent hope that all major international police forces have already mobilized to co-operate and take whatever measures are necessary to bring these criminals to justice.

Weekend news reports about the Soho bombing mentioned that the White Wolves are believed to have connections with neo-Nazis in the United States and Europe. If the Wolves are connected to violent hatemongers and racists in the United States, they are undoubtedly connected to their Canadian counterparts as well.

We expect, therefore, that the government of Canada will join in what we hope is a co-operative, international law enforcement effort to stop these white predators, white cowards, White Wolves.

By forebears' grace

There is, in Jewish tradition, a notion that good things can happen to someone by dint of the good deeds and the grace of one's forebears. It is called, in Hebrew, b'zchut avot, roughly translated as by the merit of one's forebears. It was therefore with great pleasure that one could read in the New York Times last Sunday a story about the metaphysical magic of b'zchut avot.

The parents of Lamija Jaha, an ethnic Albanian Kosovar, through courage and kindness, saved Davor Bakovic's mother, a Jew, during World War II. Today, Lamija Jaha and her family are in Kibbutz Ma'agan Michael in Israel, rescued from certain brutality and possible death at the hands of Slobodan Milosevic's henchmen.

Because we can never know the future, we must try to perfect the present, if not for the sake of the world, then for the sake of our children.

Never again justifies NATO bombing

Henry Srebrnik is rethinking his support of NATO air strikes (CJN, April 22), as are some Israeli leaders, because they are relating the conflict between Serbs and Kosovar Albanians with the conflict between Arabs and Jews. That is why these leaders are not speaking out against the atrocities being inflicted upon the Kosovar Albanians.

Srebrnik cites incidences in the past where Serbia was a friend of the Jews, and all the other Yugoslav peoples, the Croats, Albanians and Bosnians, were enemies, or at the very least, not friends of the Jews.

Srebrnik forgets one thing which means a great deal to the Jewish people. That is that "never again" applies to Jews as well as non-Jews.

Ethnic cleansing may or may not be genocide or even a holocaust, but it is taking people out of their homes, taking away most of their possessions and driving them to the border. It is taking men and shooting them in the head. It is raping of women. It also means mass graves. We saw what ethnic cleansing meant in Bosnia and we now have a repeat performance.

If this is not a holocaust then it is heading in the right direction. Srebrnik gives logical reasons for the Serbs doing what they are doing. Hitler also had reasons for his actions which people around the world had no quarrel with, even before the war. I often think that if the world had done for the Jewish people in 1939 what NATO is doing for the Kosovar Albanians, how magnanimous that would have been.

No, our motto is "never again," and that applies to all people, no matter what their race, ethnicity, demography, politics or circumstances.

Bans on Passover foods going too far

In the world of health, diet and fitness there is a woman who has been promoting her particular ideas under the caption "Stop the Insanity!" I think that the same thing applies to how the holiday of Passover is developing. What began (at least according to tradition) as a holiday on which chametz was to be avoided, has now expanded to include a ban on many other things.

Legumes (peanuts, corn, rice, beans, peas) are not grains, but have become prohibited to those who adhere to the Ashkenazi tradition, despite the circuitous "logic" involved in that ban. Now some have added a prohibition against using matzah in any mixture with water. Therefore, knaidlach and cakes made from matzah meal or matzah cake meal have become forbidden to some, and the word gebrokts, has entered the lexicon.

And now, certain fruits and vegetables are no longer considered kosher by some Jews. Try and find broccoli, asparagus, or strawberries in some kosher restaurants. Where will this end? Isn't it enough what the Torah forbids? Do Jews need to look for extreme, unreasonable and far-fetched additional prohibitions to observe? Isn't it time somebody said: "Stop the Insanity?"

World never learns the lesson of war

A great sigh of relief echoed through the world on VE day, a half a century ago. "Well," we said, "thank God that's over with." The western world had learned its lesson, and peace, in one form or another, has comforted the residents of our corner of the world ever since.

Recently, however, our eyes have been opened to the duality of the world we live in. Articles and videos that we don't want to see, surround us, grab us, force us to look at human nature in its basest form. Suddenly, the long-forgotten beast has reared its ominous head. The civilized world is aghast. How could we have been so blind? We must stop this war. We must never let this happen again. We have seen too many mass graves. The western world has once again learned its lesson. No longer will oppression and hatred rule any part of our planet, no matter how remote.

It is with this in mind that we all hope and pray for a speedy end to the horrors and atrocities of Kosovo. "Well," we'll say, "thank God that's over with."

At least, that is, until the next war comes along.

Unlike Kosovars, Holocaust Jews had no hope

It was interesting to read Rabbi Gunther Plaut's remarks as to the difference between the expulsion of the Kosovars, and the Shoah. (CJN, Apr. 22)

In a catastrophic event, when people are brutally expelled from their homes, facing a threatening and unknown future, the only thing left is hope. The Kosovars realistically have that hope, knowing that efforts are underway to feed them and provide some shelter. NATO even promises them an eventual return to their homeland.

The victims of the Holocaust, however, were robbed of any glimmer of hope, facing nothing but anguish, torture and death.

The Israeli and Canadian political systems: a primer and critical comparison

By DAVID GOLDBERG

Israel and Canada are fellow democracies. Both have enshrined in their political cultures basic precepts of democracy. These include constitutionally guaranteed freedoms of speech and assembly, universal suffrage, multi-party electoral systems, respect for human rights, a professional civil service, and the hallmark "checks and balances" on political power, such as an independent judiciary, independent press and independent police force.

Nevertheless, despite these shared democratic values and traditions, there are important differences between the Israeli and Canadian political systems, several of which emerge in the current campaign leading up to the May 17th elections in Israel. This article will highlight some of these differences.

Whereas Canada has a bicameral parliament, comprised of the House of Commons and the Senate, Israel's legislative system is unicameral, centred exclusively around the Knesset. The members of the House of Commons are chosen directly through a constituency-based "first past the post" electoral system, and the senators are appointed by the prime minister, ostensibly in consultation with the provincial premiers. The members of Israel's 120-seat Knesset, however, are elected in an indirect manner, with their entry to the Knesset determined by their placement on party lists.

Unlike Canada, which is divided into 301 separate ridings, all of Israel is one big riding. The number of Knesset seats won by a party is based on its share of the popular vote.

Canada's electoral process is based on the British parliamentary tradition. By contrast, Israel's electoral system has its roots in the complex political compromises that were made in the early days of the Zionist movement and in the pre-state Jewish community (Yishuv) in mandatory Palestine.

In order to ensure maximum participation in the political enterprise unfolding in Palestine, each party and political faction was accorded a degree of representation roughly equivalent to its size and popularity. This system of proportional representation, forms of which are common in Europe, was adopted by Israel when it achieved statehood in 1948.

For the first four decades of independence, the percentage of votes cast that enabled a party to win a seat in the Knesset was one percent. The percentage was increased to 1.5 percent in 1992.

Thus, for a party to win a seat in the upcoming 15th Knesset, it will need approximately 55,000 votes.This system of proportional representation, coupled with the low Knesset-entry "hurdle," historically, have prevented any one Israeli party from winning a clear majority of seats in the Knesset, leading in turn, to the formation of complex coalition arrangements generally unseen in Canada.

Moreover, though Canadians aspiring to enter politics usually need the endorsement of their local riding associations and/or the national parties, for the most part we have not experienced the kind of horse-trading and backroom dealings that have traditionally typified the process by which Israeli political parties form their electoral lists.

The Israeli and Canadian systems differ also in the ways in which they select their heads of state and heads of government.

The head of state in Canada is the British monarch, represented by the governor general. By custom, he or she is formally appointed by the monarch, on the advice of Canada's prime minister.

Israel's head of state, the president (nasi), is formally elected by the Knesset. Historically, the election of the president has been perfunctory, with the candidate already being agreed upon by the major parties.

However, this has not always been the case. Indeed, Israel's current president, Ezer Weizman, was re-elected in March 1998 with 63 of 120 Knesset votes, after an intense and open challenge from his competitor, Likud member of Knesset Shaul Amor.

The powers and responsibilities of Canada's governor general and the president of Israel are generally similar. Both represent their countries in official functions, administer oaths of office to senior government officials and supreme court justices, and receive the credentials of foreign diplomats.

The Canadian head is empowered to invite the leader of the largest party in the legislature to form a new government. With the adoption of the direct election of the prime minister in 1996, (more about this development in a moment) this power and responsibility were taken away from Israel's president.

While it is not unheard of for the governor general to comment on public policy, this has occurred only in exceptional circumstances. By contrast, Israeli presidents have more frequently used their office to comment on, and try to influence the affairs of state. This has most certainly been the case with the current president, Ezer Weizman, though previous presidents too have sought to intervene in the day-to-day functioning of the government.

In both countries, the head of government is the prime minister. In Canada, the person who leads the party that gains the most seats in an election is asked by the head of state to form a government, and thereby become the prime minister.

Until 1996, that was also the method for choosing the prime minister in Israel.

Since then, Israel's prime minister is chosen through direct election simultaneous with the election for the Knesset. If no candidate receives a majority of the votes, a run-off ballot between the two leading candidates must be held. If necessary, the run-off will be held on June 1.

According to the amended Basic Law: The Government, a candidate for prime minister may be nominated by a party, or a group of parties, holding at least 10 seats in the outgoing Knesset, or by a petition bearing the signature of 50,000 eligible Israeli voters.

Israel's Knesset

By contrast, another declared candidate for prime minister, former Moledet Knesset member Yosef Bagad, was disqualified when it was discovered that many of the signatures in support of his candidacy were fraudulent, and when he failed to gain the endorsement of 10 Knesset members.

Israel's prime minister-elect has 45 days in which to form a government. By law, the cabinet must be comprised of no fewer than eight ministers (including the prime minister), and no more than 18. There is no legal requirement for cabinet ministers to be members of the Knesset, though all must be eligible to run for the Knesset. So it was, that Ya'akov Ne'eman served for a time as minister of finance in the Netanyahu government, without ever becoming a member of Knesset.

Similarly, in Canada, Prime Minister Jean Chrétien first brought unelected Stephane Dion and Pierre Pettigrew into the federal cabinet, though both subsequently successfully contested seats in Parliament.

Unlike Canada, where senior members of the governmental bureaucracy are usually professional civil servants, in Israel, it is often the case that senior bureaucrats, including deputy cabinet ministers, are either political appointees or members of the Knesset.

This "politicization" of the senior civil service is one consequence of the many and complex compromises an Israeli prime minister must make to form a coalition government out of the chaos that arises from an electoral system comprised of, literally, scores of political parties and special interest groups.

To be sure, Israelis and Canadians are both able to boast that they have multi-party electoral systems. However, there are multi-party systems and there are multi-party systems! Canada's House of Commons is presently comprised of five political parties; by comparison, the 14th Knesset was comprised of a total of 11 parties, and there are some 33 parties registered to contest the elections to the new Knesset!

Most analysts conclude that this is indeed a recipe for chaos and confusion, if not outright political stalemate!

As already noted, Israel's system of proportional representation, combined with the low threshold for winning seats in the Knesset, encourage the participation in the electoral process of an extraordinarily large number of political parties, representing a wide array of special interests and positions on the ideological spectrum.

Moreover, the electoral system militates against any one party winning a majority of seats in the Knesset. Indeed, in Israel's 51 years of statehood, there has never been a majority government.

Of course, minority governments and coalition governments are not unheard of in Canadian politics. However, given the limited number of parties contesting elections, coalition governments tend to be the exception rather than the rule in Canada.

The reverse is the case in Israel. It is difficult to imagine a party emerging from the May 17th elections with a majority of seats. This means that the prime minister-elect will have to form a governing coalition based on the kind of complex political compromises and "dirty" backroom deals rarely experienced in Canadian politics.

In the final analysis, there are indeed many differences between the Israeli and Canadian political and electoral systems. The essential characteristic of the two systems however, is that they share an overriding loyalty to democracy. Each has adapted their democratic institutions to the many unique political challenges confronting them.

Of course, neither system is ideal. What system on earth is? But, to paraphrase Winston Churchill, while the Israeli and Canadian derivatives of democracy may not be perfect, they are infinitely better than any derivative of non-democratic government.

Burying my last aunt

My Aunt Alice, who recently died in California, was born in 1897 into a family of 15 children, of whom 13 grew to adulthood. She was destined to live just about the entire 20th century – and what a life it was!

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Early on, she exhibited intellectual capacity, and was sent to various special schools, including university – which in those days was unusual for a daughter of a highly conservative Jewish family in Germany. Women were destined for family life and not for a career.

But Aunt Alice had her own plans. She graduated from university and then went to postgraduate school. Though in the early 1920s she even earned a PhD in physics and chemistry, she could not get a job for quite a while, being both Jewish and a woman.

Fortunately, she met her future husband whose meteoric career in the judiciary was equally remarkable, for he became the chief justice of one of Germany's states – an achievement that was also a rare exception for a Jew.

Not long thereafter, however, when the Nazis came to power, her husband was humiliated and discharged, loaded on a truck and exhibited for public view with a placard around his neck which proclaimed him to be a Jewish traitor, and therefore to be despised and spat upon.

Emigration followed soon thereafter for the two, and South Africa gave them a haven. There, Alice became the initial breadwinner for the family, concocting cosmetic creations – something she had learned to do when studying chemistry. The couple had one son. Eventually Alice's husband did pass his law examinations, but before long, fate felled him, and he died in 1960 while returning to South Africa from a trip abroad. (They had visited my mother on her 70th birthday.)

Alice now migrated again, and joined her son, who had settled in New York. She engaged in a series of activities as a volunteer in the Jewish community. An avid reader and intellectual, she was also a great hiker, a member of the Sierra Club, and outdid many of her friends when climbing mountainous terrains on their regular excursions.

She made a wonderful circle of friends and was proud of her son, who, like his father, had his own splendid career that led him to become the president of one of the United States' great retail stores, Mac's West. In the course of his changing posts, Alice went along with him, first to Los Angeles, then to Houston, back to Los Angeles, and eventually to San Francisco, where she died.

She was the last of her kind, my mother's younger sister. Only 11 years ago, the two of them and one other sister, still met at a European resort for their annual summer get-together. Today all three are gone.

I flew to California to be at the funeral and comfort the family as well as myself. Now a chapter in my own life has been closed, and my generation is the oldest one in our clan.

I am most fortunate to belong to a family that produced the likes of my Aunt Alice. The century comes to a close, but her memory will always be alive.

Election countdown

Two weeks before Israelis go to the polls, any prediction I make is bound to be risk laden. However, a few things are clear. Unless Itzik Mordechai, leader of the new centrist party, withdraws his candidacy for prime minister before May 17, for the first time in their history, Israelis will vote in a run-off, scheduled for June 1.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

That vote will decide the prime minister, and any polls that speculate on the results of that vote are, indeed, merely speculative. They are anticipating a hypothetical situation that the voters have never faced. And how those voters really behave will be determined by the results of the Knesset vote on May 17, and not just by their stated preferences at this time.

It is also clear that the results of the prime ministerial vote will depend on the behavior of three distinct blocs: the haredim who support Benjamin Netanyahu, the Israeli Arabs who support Ehud Barak, and the Russian Israelis who support Netanyahu. The haredim tend to vote en bloc, in a highly disciplined fashion. The Arabs may not show up in full force on June 1, and any drop in their voting participation will adversely affect Barak. In turn, if the Russian voters stay at home, this will adversely affect Netanyahu.

In 1996, Netanyahu won by only 15,000 votes, and the result could be just as close this time around. The two weeks separating the votes are likely to be an intense period of negotiations, as the two remaining contenders (probably Barak and Netanyahu) vie for promises of support that will get them over the 50 percent threshold.

There are two deeper trends that can also be discerned. First, is the general acknowledgement that whatever the results of the vote, the country needs a national unity government, comprising both Labor and Likud.

Netanyahu has learned the lesson of his first term of office, when he governed with a majority that hamstrung him on the peace process, and finally led to this month's early elections. He risked losing his majority if he proceeded with the peace process, and he risked losing it if he did nothing. Furthermore, the centre-right in Israeli politics knows that it has to stay close to the centre mainstream if it is to have broad public support.

Labor, for its part, has internalized the bitter lessons of Yitzhak Rabin's assassination. It knows that in order to lead effectively on the peace issue, it cannot be perceived as being dependent on a "leftist government." Even if either party can get its own Knesset majority with the support of the new centrist party, only a coalition of Labor and Likud sends a message of broad support. In reality, therefore, the election is about who will lead a unity government.

Just weeks before the election was called, Netanyahu and Barak had essentially completed negotiations over formation of a national unity government. The agreement was never carried out, because of the lack of trust between the two men. A new election may compel them to act, and may even challenge them as leaders of their respective parties.

This may explain the low-key nature of the campaign, even as Election Day nears. The public knows full well that there are no great differences on the peace issue among the three leading candidates for prime minister. Indeed, both Barak and Mordechai have a stronger track record on security than does Netanyahu. And a majority of Israelis have repeatedly indicated their willingness to make further concessions to the Palestinians, including accepting the establishment of a Palestinian state, on certain clear conditions that safeguard Israel's security. The election, therefore, is about leadership and style.

A second, related trend is a general disenchantment with politicians. The lukewarm reaction of politicians across the board to the conviction of Shas leader Aryeh Deri has reinforced the public perception that any principle can be compromised for the sake of political gain. The outcry has come from the public, the media and even the attorney general.

Underlying it all is a sense that the values of the rule of law and the nature of Israeli democracy are profound issues that need to be debated. There is also a feeling that the Netanyahu government has not been outspoken enough in its defence of these principles. A recent, vicious, verbal attack on the police and the judiciary by Avigdor Liberman, one of Netanyahu's closest political allies and leader of a new Russian party, has reinforced this sense.

But even this critical debate is overshadowed by what remains the central issue, the future relationship with the Palestinians, and negotiations over the outstanding political and territorial questions. Israelis will vote for the man whom they believe can best lead them on this difficult road.

Fallout from Colorado

As more information comes about the horrible school shootings in the affluent suburb of Littleton, Col., we discover a clear neo-Nazi connection. The two shooters apparently timed their massacre to coincide with Hitler's birthday.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

They wore swastikas or swastika-like symbols on their clothes. They frequented neo-Nazi Web sites, and spent several years learning German. They liked music infused with racist and neo-Nazi sentiments.

What can be done? Serious gun control is long overdue in the United States. Parents must be vigilant and observant about their children's behavior. Teachers and police officers must pay attention to aberrant behavior, which is not easy to do, because so many teens naturally seek to challenge the boundaries of adult authority. Others are attracted to cults and eccentric behavior as a way to establish their individuality.

But is there not a deeper problem? While general crime rates in the United States have been declining, teenage crime is up, notably among young girls. The fatal assault on B.C. teenager Reena Virk, by young girls in the main, is in some ways as shocking as the Colorado shootings.

There is a culture of violence — and promiscuous sexuality — which has indeed been gaining ground, as can be seen most clearly in movies, computer games and television. This feeds into the racist and anti-Semitic movements which use the Internet as well as other media and art forms to spread their hateful messages. It is crucial to regulate the content of these media, no matter how challenging the task.

The cries of civil libertarians about the dangers of censorship should not lead to inaction, particularly in the United States. Regulation is required, which is not the same as censorship. It should be apparent that these media can be as harmful as tobacco and alcohol, which are regulated, and hard drugs, which are banned.

Civil libertarians are quick to argue that even the Bible is suffused with physical and sexual violence: Were not the Amalekites the first victims of attempted genocide? Should it too be off limits? (Actually, I recall in Hebrew school that our teachers would periodically skip certain portions of the Torah. After a while we quickly figured out that those were the juicy parts and read them more intently than the assigned verses.)

But the difference between the Bible and the trashy violence and racism in contemporary culture is twofold. First there is a difference in degree and sensory impact. Seeing blood and gore, enhanced by Hollywood's wizardry, is likely more influential than reading about it.

Second, for each instance of violence, the Bible has many, many examples of uplifting and inspiring morality. A civilization that can go to the moon and still revere Shakespeare can learn to differentiate between cutting edge artistic freedom and messages promoting hate and violence.

But there is no reason to undermine needed efforts at reform by overstating the problem or assuming it is unprecedented. Young adults have long been fascinated with violence, well before the advent of modern communications media, though perhaps today the problems occur at a younger age.

Universities in Europe, throughout the 19th and early 20th century, were full of student movements characterized by terrorist, nihilistic, and suicidal impulses, that arose from ideologies of both the right and left. Germany, Russia and Bosnia were particular centres. Brawls, duels, suicides, as well as cult-like rituals and secret fraternities, were not uncommon.

So the causes of the irrational violence of the Littleton teens are likely more deeply rooted than the prevailing currents in our culture and society. These clearly play a role. But so may genetic predispositions to psychopathology. So may generic patterns of neglect or abuse found among well-meaning parents. Even trained mental health professionals can be fooled by violent teens, as was the case in Colorado, where the two teens were positively assessed just a few weeks before the tragedy.

If we cannot eliminate all the root causes of this evil, we should at least limit the opportunities for it to be expressed. Control the guns and regulate the trash.

The Kirshner File

Israel's ties with Egypt fraught with tension

Twenty years ago, in an elaborate ceremony in Washington which seemed to presage a new, hopeful era in Middle East politics, Israel and Egypt promulgated an historic peace treaty.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

With it, Israel signed its first peace agreement with an Arab country, and neutralized its most dangerous military adversary.

Two decades on, Israel and Egypt maintain peaceful relations, the overriding objective of the accord. The border is quiet. Israeli tourists are free to visit Egypt and vice versa. There is trade and a modicum of co-operation in certain fields.

And yet, as Israeli politicians and commentators are wont to say, the treaty has fallen short in one major respect. Israel's relationship with Egypt remains incomplete because full normalization is still a lofty goal, rather than a concrete achievement.

In fact, "cold peace" is probably the phrase which best describes the state of Israel's ties with Egypt today.

Both sides are disillusioned. Although Egypt's ambassador to Israel, Mohammed Bassiouny, claims that relations are "normal" rather than chilly, Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak declared recently that the treaty will "stay cold" for a long time to come. And several months ago, the former Israeli envoy to Egypt, Moshe Sasson, observed: " The peace with Egypt has never been at such a low ebb."

Sasson has a point, though he overlooks one important fact. At the height of the 1982 war in Lebanon, Israel turned a blind eye to the Phalange massacre of civilians in two Palestinian refugee camps, Sabra and Shatila. This prompted Egypt to recall its resident ambassador, Saad Mortada, in Tel Aviv. Egypt did not appoint a replacement until 1986, a reflection of deep-seated anger and disappointment on the official and unofficial levels.

The treaty, a watershed in the annals of the Arab-Israeli conflict, was the culmination of a process informed by high hopes, war weariness and a change of regime in Egypt.

For 18 years, Egypt was ruled by Gamal Abdel Nasser, a fervent Arab nationalist who, through three wars in 1948, 1956 and 1967, never really reconciled himself to Israel. His successor, Anwar Sadat, more of an Egyptian patriot than a pan-Arabist, initiated the 1973 Yom Kippur War to regain the Sinai Peninsula.

On the first day of the war, Egypt stormed across the Suez Canal, captured Israel's string of fortifications there – the Bar-Lev Line – and established a beachhead in Sinai. The three-week war essentially ended in a stalemate, and resulted in a series of negotiations sponsored by the United States which climaxed with a series of Israeli withdrawals from Sinai and the 1979 peace treaty.

Sadat had five broad, inter-related goals when he entered into talks with Israel: to wrest back every square inch of Sinai; to resolve the festering Palestinian question; to develop Egypt's battered economy; to supplant the Soviet Union with the United States as Egypt's super power ally; and to position Egypt for a continual influx of American aid. (Last year, Egypt received $775 million and $1.3 billion (US) respectively in economic and military assistance from Washington).

Sadat's visit to Israel in 1977, one giant step in the march toward peace, created the conditions for the 1978 Camp David Accords, which envisaged the return of Sinai to Egypt and self-determination for the Palestinians. Camp David, in turn, spawned the 1979 treaty.

During the course of these arduous negotiations, Israel and Egypt quarrelled over the depth of Israel's pull-out from Sinai. Israel's prime minister, Menachem Begin, was loathe to relinquish Jewish settlements like Yamit in northeastern Sinai, but finally had to do so.

Once that problem was solved, there were two further sources of tension which, Egypt claims, blocked normalization. First, Begin refused to stop building new settlements in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, claiming that he had never promised to do so. Second, the Palestinian autonomy talks, which the Palestinians boycotted in any case, got hopelessly bogged down in a welter of intractable disputes over their self-governing powers.

Neither was Egypt pleased by Israel's 1981 bombing of Iraq's nuclear reactor near Baghdad. In 1982, the Egyptians condemned Israel's invasion of Lebanon. Five years later, they sided with the Palestinians when the intifadah broke out.

Israel's 1989 decision to give up Taba – a Sinai enclave bordering Eilat – dispelled some of the bitterness. But Taba was merely a truce. Egypt, much to Israel's annoyance, continued to lobby for a Palestinian state under the administration of the PLO.

With the 1993 Oslo agreement, Israel's mercurial relations with Egypt improved markedly, but not to a degree which satisfied the new government of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, who complained of an "ill wind" blowing in from Cairo.

By 1994, Israel and Egypt were embroiled in a nasty spat over Israel's refusal to sign the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. As this dispute simmered, Amr Moussa, Egypt's foreign minister, ruffled feathers by refusing to don a yarmulke while visiting Yad Vashem, the Holocaust memorial-cum-museum in Jerusalem.

Since Benjamin Netanyahu's election as prime minister in 1996, the situation has gone from bad to worse.

Within a month of his victory over Labor party candidate Shimon Peres, Netanyahu met with Mubarak in Cairo, assuring him that he had every intention of pressing ahead with Oslo. But soon, Mubarak accused Netanyahu of prevaricating and of doublecrossing him.

Since then, with the Har Choma housing project in eastern Jerusalem, the expansion of Israeli settlements in the territories and the breakdown of the 1998 Wye memorandum, Mubarak has charged Netanyahu's government with undermining the peace process.

By way of reaction, Egypt has spearheaded an Arab League campaign to stymie Israel's efforts to deepen nascent relations with Arab countries such as Morocco, Tunisia, Qatar and Oman.

In addition, Egypt boycotted a 1997 economic conference in Qatar, scheduled to be attended by Israel. Several months ago, Egypt rejected an Israeli request to take part in Cairo's international book fair on the grounds that Israel was not fully implementing the Wye agreement.

Egypt's unfriendly attitude, however, is not just rooted in its criticism of Israel's policy. Egypt regards Israel as a serious regional rival.

Hosni Mubarak

Due to these considerations, the quality of Egypt's bilateral ties with Israel leaves much to be desired. In all but two sectors, agriculture and trade, Egypt has discouraged co-operation. Relatively few Egyptians visit Israel. Cultural ties are all but non-existent. The vast majority of Egyptian intellectuals are hostile. Professional syndicates – doctors, lawyers and so on – shun Israel altogether. The Egyptian mass media is vehemently anti-Israel and occasionally anti-Semitic.

Given the inhospitable climate, few observers are surprised that Mubarak has not freed Azzam Azzam, an Israeli Druze who was accused of spying for Israel and given a 15-year prison sentence.

Mubarak himself, while having hosted Israeli leaders in Egypt, has studiously rejected Israeli invitations for a reciprocal visit. As president, he has visited Israel only once, in 1995 for Rabin's funeral.

Proclaiming freedom for all the people

By RABBI RONNIE CAHANA

This week's Torah portion teaches us about the holiness of space. What sort of home do we build? What sort of temple do we make for ourselves? What sort of a society do we take responsibility for?

Just as on Pesach there is a cleansing, both inside all Jewish establishments and in ourselves, so is there a spiritual need to live so that we treat all people and all matters with holiness and dignity; creating a temple in our midst.

The Torah speaks of proclaiming freedom in the land to all the inhabitants. (Lev. 25:10.) It is through the land, through the way we live with our society and our community, and how we love what we have, that brings freedom.

Unfortunately, many people have cultivated the idea that they are never to feel at home. They stay perpetual strangers and outsiders (as if this gives a unique and valued status). Many like to say, "I feel Jewish in Canada and Canadian in Israel." To them, a Jew is never to find home.

The Torah, however, teaches us to make the stranger find home. "Proclaim freedom for all the people." It does not say to do this just for the citizens or just for the slaves or the elite or the farmers or the intelligentsia. Proclaim freedom so that all can be free, and none will feel oppressed.

The freedom that will come to Kosovo must be more than just remaining in Serbia. Freedom cannot be coupled with destruction (not in Belgrade, not in Pristina), and the world is waiting to see how the Kosovar refugees will be treated, as well as to see if democracy will truly replace the dictatorship. These are ethical principles that the religion of Torah insists upon.

The value in Torah is that the world is God's. The holy land, as well as its produce, is God's, and the land itself must be accorded a Shabbat to recognize God as the creator and owner.

Holiness is in the detail of love, in the cultivation of peace and rest to all things, so that they can restore. Every society, every community, must be led with a sense of giving everyone a higher mission, or everyone is dragged underground. Every seven years, a Shabbat is given to all who might feel oppressed and burdened, so that there can be no misuse under the guise of law or under the guise of emergency.

I am reminded of the story of the child who played hide-and-seek alone. After 30 minutes, he realized sadly that no one was looking for him. So, one would think, it is with God. Many people who read the Torah do not look for God inside it. Many who come to the holy land, do not look to see God there. Many of us don't take responsibility for what society is doing to others. We continue to make others feel like strangers, and to justify that they should feel oppressed.

"And you shall not hurt one another but you should fear your God, for I, God, am your God." (Lev. 25:17.) The Torah teaches that you should fear God so that you don't deceive yourself nor oppress with false justifications. God watches over all and we should never forget it. Shabbat Shalom.

Israel's political parties

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

As election day approaches, we continue to survey the Web sites Israelis are surfing as they prepare to vote for the next Knesset.

Not surprisingly, one of the largest sites belongs to Israel's ruling Likud party [http://www.likud.org.il/english/index.html]. The English part has sections devoted to party platform ("will not cave in to Arafat; protecting a united Jerusalem") and a message from Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. However, in the Hebrew area, the site excels. There, you can listen to the Likud jingle [http://www.likud.org.il/b3d.html] or even watch three slick television ads about Likud and view a message from the prime minister. Likud Holland also operates a bilingual Dutch/English site [http://alpha.nedernet.nl/~likoed/].

The Labor party has also set up an impressive Hebrew-only site [http://www.avoda.org.il/]. There are profiles of leader Ehud Barak and other Labor members of Knesset, and there's an area where you are invited to participate in a debate about the election [http://www.avoda.org.il/forum.html].

You can view four Labor party TV commercials at the One Israel site [http://www.oneisrael.co.il/]. The Labor youth wing operates its own Web page [http://www.geocities.com/CapitolHill/1548/] complete with a Top Ten List of Things You Should Know About Ehud Barak.

Halchud HaLeumi [http://www.gezernet.co.il/tgs/ICHUD/english.html] is a coalition of the Moledet [http://www.moledet.org.il/], Herut and Tekumah parties. Led by prime ministerial candidate Benny Begin, the party opposes the Wye agreement and supports "the acceleration of Jewish settlement in all parts of the Land of Israel."

The Third Way [http://www.thirdway.org.il/] is Avigdor Kahalani's centrist political party. Kahalani, a former member of the Labor party, objects to withdrawal from the Golan Heights.

Tsomet is headed by veteran politician Rafael Eitan [http://www.tsomet.org.il]. According to its platform, "the people of Israel has the sole right to the Land of Israel." Like most election sites, this one has information in Hebrew and English. But in a nod to the political realities of Israel, this one also has pages in Russian and Amharic, the language of the Ethiopian immigrants.

At Hadash, the Communist party of Israel Web site, "the struggle goes on" [http://www.hadash.org.il/]. A predominantly Arab party, Hadash (along with the Balad party) had five seats in the previous Knesset. A feature article in Ha'aretz magazine said Hadash-Balad MK Azmi Bishara is "perhaps the most articulate, thoughtful and effective adversary of Zionist ideology in Israel today." [http://www.muwatin.org/citizenazmi.htm].

The headline at Israel's Green party [http://www.yerukim.org/] will probably turn heads: "Peace in Israel is only a matter of time. But what happens until then?" The Hebrew-only Web site is concerned with such issues as water and air quality, urban sprawl and chemical and biological waste.

Several prominent parties have decided not to establish a presence on the Web. For background on Agudat Yisrael, Mercaz, Yisrael Beitenu, Degel HaTorah, Shas and the National Religious Party, check out the Jerusalem Post site [http://www.jpost.co.il/Info/Elections99], Jewish Telegraphic Agency [http://www.jta.org/elect.htm], Israel Wire [http://www.israelwire.com/elections.html] and in Hebrew, Yedioth Aharonot [http://www.elections-yedioth.co.il].

Any veteran politician would agree that politics is a gamble. Ezra Tisona would surely agree. The millionaire is the founder of Israel's Casino party [http://www.zyworld.com/casinoparty/]. Tisona says betting should be decriminalized and casinos should be set up throughout the country.

Midrashic Moments

Story of Ruth and Naomi

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

The holiday of Shavuot is approaching and our thoughts turn to the Book of Ruth and the story of Ruth and Naomi. It is the story of a bond that forms between two women – Ruth, a Moabite and Naomi, an Israelite.

The story begins with Naomi and her family – her husband and her two sons. As Naomi begins her journey, she is the only woman surrounded by a family of men.

Within the first chapter of the book all the men of her family die and Naomi finds herself surrounded by her daughters-in-law. Thus the story quickly recontextualizes Naomi from a woman among men to a woman among women.

Her daughter-in-law, Ruth, articulates her loyalty to Naomi and formally converts to Judaism. Her declaration begins with the now famous words: "Whither thou goest, I will go."

Interestingly, these words take place at a time in the story when there is no male presence. The husbands have died and Boaz (the husband-to-be) has not yet appeared.

In fact, Naomi has just finished telling her daughters-in-law that she has no ability to provide any men for them and thus the possibility of potential men has also been dismissed.

The text has reinforced the absolutely female setting within which Ruth's words are spoken. Also, Naomi is returning from the land of Moab to the land of Israel. In essence, Naomi is returning from living in exile back to the covenantal land.

There is a beautiful midrash that echoes these ideas and speaks to Ruth's declaration. Numbers Rabbah states that the Shchinah would accompany Israel whenever she was exiled. The Shchinah is God's Presence on earth and the rabbis state several times throughout midrash and Talmud that the Shchinah is intrinsically tied to the Jewish people and their deeds.

The rabbis have assured us that whether we are in exile or in the land of Israel, God has never abandoned us for the Shchinah has followed us wherever we go. The Shchinah is also always referred to in the feminine form.

When Ruth declares to Naomi that she will follow her from Moab to Israel, from Naomi's exile to her promised land, from Ruth's homeland to her self-imposed exile, she has declared an understanding of one of the basic fundamental pillars of Judaism: The covenant bonds God and the Jewish people. The covenant embodies loyalty; neither party can abandon the other.

Wherever we may be, the Shchinah will be with us and we must strive to return that loyalty. On Shavuot, when we celebrate the receiving of the Torah and the covenant it contains, we should hear Ruth's words echoing: "Whither thou goest, I will go."

Valuable lessons learned in Israel

Guest Voice

By LAURIE FAINER

One of the elements of Judaism that I enjoy the most is its spirituality, the fact that prayer, whether it is your own or from a siddur, no matter where you pray, will lead you to feel closer to God.

When I first informed my rabbi that I might be interested in the rabbinate, he suggested that I should visit Israel, and have Judaism and its spirituality enter my life on an daily basis.

The program suggested was a four-month exchange, known as the NFTY Eisendrath International Exchange. After much fundraising and soul searching, I began my journey from Hamilton, Ont. to Israel, as the only Canadian participant in a group of 29.

This program allows the participant to become completely immersed in Hebrew language and Jewish history. What made the history lessons unique, was that we would learn about an ancient story or ruin, and then we would go out and see the relics, or walk where our ancestors had.

We had general studies in the afternoon. For me, they were chemistry and economics, and I received full credit for all four courses from my home high school.

The program also showed us modern culture. We spent eight weeks at the Hebrew Union College campus in Jerusalem, and then some time living with an Israeli host family, and two weeks on Reform kibbutzim. After that, we spent a week in Gadna, in army training, which every Israeli must do the year before they enter the army.

Periodically, we would go on extended trips around Israel, such as a hike from the Mediterranean to the Kinneret seas; and an outward-bound experience in the Negev, where we hiked in the desert, slept under the stars, snorkeled in Eilat, slept and dined in a Bedouin tent, and rode camels.

After my trip, I realized that three things had had an impact on me.

First, I found that staying with a host family was beneficial. It helped me to feel like an Israeli citizen. The fact that I had to take city buses for 45-minute rides in the morning and at night by myself, enabled me to learn the whole central area of Jerusalem like the back of my hand.

I found out that Israeli families' norms and values are quite different from ours. For example, in North America, we put limits such as curfews on teenage children. However, in Israel, it seems that once children turn 15, they are given a key, and told they can come and go as they please, which they do readily.

In some ways, this freedom is a good thing, for it helps prepare the children for their army service, where they are in charge of themselves.

Secondly, before I left for Israel, I heard that Reform Judaism was dead in Jerusalem. I wanted to verify this before I made any such assumptions. I am pleased to report, however, that there is a Reform congregation, Kol Haneshema, which has a growing population, and several other Reform synagogues are starting up in Israel.

I found that in Israel, you didn't have to search too hard to experience holiness. There was a sense of spirituality everywhere, whether at a market or at the Western Wall.

I enjoyed the fact that the services were all in Hebrew, and that things just shut down for High Holy Days. For example, on Yom Kippur you can literally run through the streets, as it is against the law to drive.

Lastly, I found that Israeli people deal with fear very differently from North Americans. There were times when bombs would go off only a few streets away, and although they wouldn't let us into the area for a few days, we were encouraged to go back when the restrictions had been lifted. You have to make an effort not to live in fear in Israel. If you let it affect you, then the terrorists are essentially winning.

This trip was an experience that taught me, not just about my heritage, but about living in a society unlike my own. I also learned many valuable lessons about myself.

USDS students assist kids in developing countries

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Students at the Bayview Campus of United Synagogue Day School (USDS) have donated nearly 200 kits of school supplies to children in developing countries.

The kits were presented at a special assembly last week to Craig Kielburger, the 16-year-old founder of Free the Children, an organization that provides school and health supplies for needy youngsters in such places as India, Brazil, Senegal, Kenya, and the Balkans.

The material collected by USDS students is earmarked for use by the Mandela Children's Fund in South Africa.

Kielburger explained that in many countries, including South Africa, children cannot attend school if they don't have their own school supplies, which many of the children are too poor to purchase.

Cherie Sachar, advisor to the students council, told The CJN that the project was part of the school's ongoing tikun olam (healing the world) tzedakah efforts.

Encouraged by the example of students at German Mills Public School, who had already been involved in Free the Children, the USDS students, in grades 6, 7 and 8, raised money, partly through a Sportathon. They also diligently scrounged for donations from companies, businesses and individuals.

Each cloth-bagged kit consisted of notebooks, pens and pencils, a ruler, scissors, crayons, erasers, stickers, a toy, and a personal greeting from the student who packed the kit.

Sachar said that the youngsters tried hard to make the kits more personal. "For instance, they found colorful stickers and funky erasers."

To the strains of Michael Jackson's Heal the World, the students came up to the stage and dropped the kits in shopping carts before they were packed up for shipment.

Kielburger, whose polished yet passionate address belied his age, gave a dramatic description of youngsters with no skills, and little hope, living in garbage dumps, or working 14 hours a day making cigarettes. Because they can't read, he said, they can be cheated and tricked. "They are powerless."

"Don't underestimate what you have done," he told the spellbound students. "You are giving a child the freedom to go to school, to be empowered. You are helping change the world by helping one person at a time."

Questions came thick and fast to Kielburger, who said he has been involved with helping children since he was twelve.

"Get your friends, your synagogue groups, the boy scouts, clubs to help," he pleaded, agreeing with a questioner who pointed out that since school supplies get used up quickly, there is a constant need to replenish the supply.

Free the Children works with grass-roots organizations to ensure that the material goes to those who really need it, he said.

Kielburger said that his organization is also sending health supplies and teddy bears to children in war-torn Kosovo.

While the project was carried out under the auspices of the student council, organizers were Alex Baker, Ashley Kochman and Lesley Suchter.

Secular humanism said gaining ground in Israel

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Zev Katz has his work cut out. As one of the leading secular humanists in Israel, his goal is to reinterpret Jewish tradition and merge it with the modern realities of science and rationalism – and all in the Jewish state yet.

It must be a task, advocating late 20th century-style secular humanism in the place founded on Jewish principles and where strict religious standards still dominate parts of daily life.

Katz, 75, cradles his chin and reflects on that. "Tradition and religion are two different things," he says. "Tradition existed even before Judaism." Strict Orthodoxy "doesn't live up to modern humanism [because] the elements of modern humanism are liberty, fraternity and equality."

So how does the rallying cry of the French Revolution affect the roughly 20,000 secular humanists in Israel, where institutions like marriage, divorce, conversion and burial are still governed by an Orthodox monopoly?

"We are not in the same boat as the Orthodox," Katz says diplomatically. "But we are careful not to offend.

"Our enterprise is a search for continuing Jewish tradition and values in a non-religious, non-obligatory way. Religion should not be mixed with politics. It should not be imposed."

Secular Jews, explains Katz, a writer, teacher and long-time activist, don't automatically disdain faith or elements of it. He points out that 94 percent of all Israelis attended a seder and similar high numbers mark all the major holy days.

But at the same time, between 70 and 80 percent of Israelis believe there should be alternatives to current laws on marriage, divorce, conversion and burials.

Together with Prof. Yehuda Bauer of Hebrew University (Hebrew U), Katz co-founded the Israel Association for Secular Humanistic Judaism, to give voice to those Israelis who choose to live outside the religious mainstream.

Zev Katz

Katz, who teaches at Hebrew U, was in Toronto recently for a talk at a local high school presented by Oraynu (formerly the Secular Jewish Association). This local group, which is made up of 60 families, advances secular humanistic Judaism.

A one-time volunteer in Israel's pre-state Haganah, Katz is also active in secular humanism on the international level. He says it's ironic he's a secularist, given that he descends from a long line of Belz Chassidim.

But he has not eschewed religious trappings entirely.

"I keep Shabbat," he told The CJN in an interview. "I think it's a great idea to have one day to be free of everyday concerns, to study, to have spiritual renewal. But it should not be forced."

In Israel, Katz is active in a coalition of intellectuals, scientists, non-Orthodox rabbis and women who are fighting the Orthodox monopoly on life-cycle events.

Their campaign, he points out, has picked up steam over the past few years due to the influx of Russian immigrants, many of whom have questionable status as Jews, because their lineage has been passed through their fathers rather than their mothers.

Many Israelis get around Orthodox-only marriage laws by tying the knot outside the country. Katz points out that 25 percent of all marriages registered in Israel are performed in Cyprus or elsewhere abroad.

Katz also counts as a victory, of sorts, the recommendations of the Ne'eman Commission, which addressed the Orthodox monopoly on conversions.

The commission suggested the establishment of a conversion institute, where converts would be taught Orthodox, Conservative and Reform thought. The Institute for Judaic Studies, located in Carmiel, launched its programs in March, with 37 students, all from the former Soviet Union.

Ultimately, conversions will still be Orthodox, "but for the first time, they will be exposed to other streams of Judaism," Katz says.

When it comes to the thorny issue of conversion, Katz has his own yardstick: "Anyone who laughs when a Jew laughs and cries when a Jew cries, I say, certify him."

Another breakthrough came recently when the Supreme Court ordered the religious council of the municipality of Dimona to accept a woman. "We hope that in the same way, Reform and Conservative [Jews] will be recognized on religious councils," Katz says.

But perhaps the strongest advance for Katz and fellow secularists came in March, when Israel's first secular burials took place, in Beersheva. This was after two years of wrangling. In 1996, the Supreme Court ruled against the Orthodox monopoly and ordered that space be set aside in Jewish cemeteries for "alternative" burials.

Secular Jews will continue their campaign, Katz says, but much depends on the outcome of this month's elections, and how much a new government will have to depend on Orthodox parties to form a coalition.

Other advances include last year's establishment in Israel of the Institute for Pluralistic Judaism, which the government and the New Israel Fund finances to the tune of about 2.5 million shekels a year. The money goes to school curricula, publications and outreach.

Katz also proposes what many might consider a paradox: a yeshiva for secular Jewish studies. Its students would also serve in the armed forces.

"Our main point," Katz says, "is to view Judaism as a culture and not necessarily as a religion. Many founders of Israel espoused the same principles.

"Everybody has the right to interpret the Jewish tradition the way he or she sees it, according to individual standards, tastes and preferences."

Women receive tips on how to better balance their priorities

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — If you're too busy to even think about managing your time better, Jerome Shore has one tip. Stop answering your phone – even if you can only stop until 9:30 or 10 a.m.

Speaking at an evening seminar called Balance Your Act, which was co-sponsored by Jewish Women's Federation and UJA Federation Women's Campaign at the Lipa Green Building, Shore advised an audience of about 40 women, "If you're doing something that's really important, do a good job on it, get it done really well and don't do anything else."

Shore, who is in business with his wife, is managing partner of The Coaching Clinic. He led participants through several workbook exercises geared to determine an individual vision of a balanced life, and how to achieve it.

His hope, he said, was that participants would leave with a commitment to change one habit. "Maybe it will be a crucial difference that will have a domino effect," he said.

Guilt, perfectionism and family obligations are among the barriers to achieving balance, suggested some of the women.

Sometimes dealing with guilt is a matter of examining underlying beliefs, Shore explained.

"I see a lot of working women whose house isn't as neat as they want it to be. Their mothers, who didn't work, always had the beds made. You've got to factor in, 'Mom didn't work, and there are so many more things for me to do,'" he said.

Shore offered a number of strategies for getting things done, but the tip he feels is most important is to do one high-priority activity from each of three categories – work, home and personal – early in the day.

He suggested that mothers get up an hour before their children to carve out time for themselves. (The flip side, he noted, is that they have to go to bed earlier.)

If people don't set aside personal time – for example, to work out – they will feel stressed and imbalanced, Shore said.

A lot of people are helpless, he believes, because they over-generalize, saying "I'm not that type of person" or "It doesn't work for me."

One participant suggested delegation as a strategy. "One of the problems," said Shore, "is that it's typically easier to do something yourself than to delegate."

Changing your expectations of the person to whom you delegate, and letting go of the belief you have to do something yourself, may help, he said.

He also offered other ways of delegating, such as to the garbage can, "to your body" (by getting in better shape to be able to handle more), or to "a policy," such as not answering the phone at dinnertime.

Shore is an advocate of cleaning up messes, both physical and other, such as administrative, legal, and relationship-related messes.

"How many people get a burst of energy when they clean up their office?" he asked. "Imagine how wonderful things would be if your offices were always neat and clean."

A note of caution on work-related messes – "If you need to spend time with your kids or yourself, whether you take care of yourself or not, your in-basket will always be full," he said.

CJC outreach program takes teens to Washington

TORONTO — Instead of the usual spring kallah focusing on the Holocaust, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region (CJC) officials approved a first-time visit to Washington for the 22 teenagers in its high school outreach program.

Participants in the three-year program for teenagers living in small communities, accompanied by volunteers, went on the three-day visit that included a tour of the U.S. National Holocaust Museum.

CJC vice-chair of the Ontario region Paul Walman of Kitchener, a parent volunteer, said the tour of the Holocaust Museum was "very intense, but I needed more time to absorb as much as possible."

A past president of Beth Jacob Congregation, he said that while growing up, he had received little education about the Holocaust. "It is important to start educating Jewish youth early."

Alexandra Rawek, 15, of Peterborough, found the visit to the museum "very overwhelming. The overall effect of the visit was one of shock. It left me with my mouth wide open, trying to understand how I would have reacted if I had been a European Jew at the time."

Rawek found "particularly stunning" the exhibit featuring displays showing how the Nazis classified the races, including devices such as instruments to measure the size of heads. She also said that she had been unaware of the Nazis' extermination of disabled people.

For Jared Raab, 14, of Peterborough, "it was a powerful experience, but difficult to take in all at once. I was shocked at walking through the railcar used to transport Jews to the camp. It was mind-boggling to understand that 100 persons were in a car where only a few could rest comfortably. I now feel that I can really talk about the Holocaust with other people, including fellow classmates."

Adam Levine, 14, of Barrie said that he "cried inside" as he toured the exhibits. "I felt deep sadness and grief for what happened to my fellow Jews."

For Jessica Zimmerman, 13, of Oakville, the most emotional moment was "seeing the shoes of the victims all piled up."

After the tour of the Holocaust museum, Leanne Rosen, outreach program co-ordinator, scheduled time to discuss the visit. "They were overwhelmed, horrified, yet fascinated, especially by the concentration camp and ghetto exhibit."

CJC administrative assistant Glenda David, another parent volunteer said: "I was struck by the deep emotions and insightful remarks expressed by people so young, after such a traumatic visit."

The teens also had the opportunity to talk about their experiences growing up in small communities. "Some told of incidents with students who were either ignorant or racist, and the action or lack of action by school authorities.

"We discussed what actions to take in such circumstances, and what actions are acceptable in today's society. We reinforced how Canadian Jewish Congress can be of assistance in some instances," said Walman.

Rosen said, "We talked about [how students] need to take responsibility when they encounter racist actions. They have to take a stand and speak up.

CHAT students explore the future

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When art administrator/curator/writer Jessica Wyman was a student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) in the 1980s, she had no clue that she would ever want to do the type of work she's doing now.

Last week, Wyman spoke as one of three dozen panelists at CHAT's career day for Grade 11 students, the idea being that the teens could benefit from her experience and that of others in the workforce. Most panelists were CHAT alumni.

The program, an annual event, received funding this year for the first time from Human Resources Development Canada, enabling the school to expand it to a full day. Upward Motion, a youth-oriented customer service and conflict management training company, worked on the event in partnership with the school.

Rabbi Howard Sacknovitz, the school's director of guidance services, under whose auspices the day was organized, believes young high school students should "get a good education and begin the process of knowing what their interests and personalities are, and then finding areas that sort of match that." It's too early make narrow choices, he told The CJN.

Guidance counsellor Margaret Klompas said she hoped the 217 students in the grade would learn that there are many opportunities, and to do what they enjoy.

The day kicked off at the school with an address by Martin and Farah Perelmuter, a lawyer and former adwoman respectively, who bucked convention four years ago to establish their own speakers' bureau, Speakers' Spotlight. The couple advised students to pursue what they love to do, take risks and believe in themselves.

Students also attended two four-person panel discussions of their choice, each dedicated to a particular career field, before proceeding to the Holiday Inn Yorkdale for a kosher lunch and afternoon sessions including talks by author Karen Schaffer and motivational speaker Sunjay Nath.

Kim Ades and a four-person team from Upward Motion led an hour-long workshop involving students in a series of vignettes addressing challenges the students might face in the workplace.

"Instead of saying, 'I can't,' say, 'How can I?'" Ades advised.

As part of the morning arts and communications panel, Wyman explained that, for her, one thing led to another. When she was studying art history in university, people used to ask why she didn't do something useful, she said.

Beverly Redlick, a former teacher who became an interior designer, advised students that if they enjoy what they're doing, they'll probably be very good at it.

Jennifer Zeifman, who works in public relations, said that volunteering was probably the best thing students could do for themselves.

"It will give you an idea if this is something you want to pursue, and will give you a step up on other students who don't have that experience."

Mark Mietkiewicz, CBC-TV producer and CJN Internet columnist, touched on the work ramifications of being an observant Jew. He has found people to be "immensely gener us...as long as they know you're serious about it."

Hearing eight speakers in two hours "gave me insight into a whole bunch of careers," said student Lara Hart, who attended the education and science/math/engineering/computers sessions.

Marissa Verskin found a business panel especially helpful in offering "a lot of different opinions and ideas."

Students have to make "big decisions" about their future at a young age, noted Josh Landzberg, who has already established his own Web site design business with another student. Learning that it's possible to change course was a very important benefit of Career Day, he said.

"I think it's great that CHAT expands its horizons to do this program," said student Daniel Held. "They're always willing to do something for the students."

With files from Zoe Shapiro, Grade 8 student at Associated Hebrew School, as part of her school's job shadow day.

SHATIL shares its expertise with NGOs

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Aliza Mazor feels she has the best job in the world.

The associate director of SHATIL – the Israeli organization founded in 1982 to provide assistance to non-profit social change organizations – says she is energized by working with activists who are "so committed, dedicated and passionate about their work."

Mazor, 36, was here recently for two days to meet with supporters through the New Israel Fund (NIF), of which SHATIL is a grantee.

Toronto (a city with which she is familiar, as an alumna of Camp Shomria) was her only Canadian stop on a North American tour that also included New York, Washington and Mazor's native Chicago.

Recently, SHATIL (a Hebrew acronym that means seedling, and stands for Consulting Support Service) has become involved in a "virtual coalition," using its expertise in advocacy and coalition building to help organizations in other countries with issues involving freedom of information and the environment.

About five years ago, Mazor noted, SHATIL brought together about 80 grassroots organizations, and helped pass Israel's first freedom of information legislation.

"That was very exciting," she said.

The organization, which has a $2.6 million (US) budget and 50 employees in three locations (Jerusalem, Haifa and Beersheva), shares its expertise with about 500 non-governmental organizations, both locally and abroad, per year.

They run about 260 training sessions a year – in about five different languages, she added

In 1997, Mazor was one of three SHATIL staffers who travelled to South Africa for two weeks as guests of non-governmental organizations (NGO). The highlight for her was a retreat with Zulu women doing literacy training, economic development and domestic violence prevention.

Several months later, SHATIL brought the 20 women to Israel for 10 days. They stayed at Neve Shalom (a Jewish-Arab "village of peace" also funded by the NIF) and met with their Israeli counterparts.

"It's a real opportunity to take something Israel should be proud of – our NGO sector – and be able to show that to the world," she said, noting that as many staff as possible, even junior staff, have the opportunity to participate in international work.

A social worker by training, Mazor has been with SHATIL for the past 10 years.

She feels the NGO community "can provide a really good balance to government in terms of influencing social policy and pressing for change."

Having worked briefly for Israel's governmental social welfare system, she was so excited to discover SHATIL that she took the only position open there at the time, working as a secretary/translator for her first three months.

Even today, Mazor says, the work gives her hope.

She spent eight years building SHATIL's resource development assistance department – the area responsible for training NGOs in skills like proposal writing and fundraising – before becoming SHATIL's development director. Earlier this year, she was named associate director.

Although SHATIL has no specific projects with Canada (its work being geared more to developing democracies), Canadians who have expertise in related areas have volunteered with the organization.

A current SHATIL project, still in the works, is a planned "models sharing" conference for peace groups. The intention is to build "an ongoing connection, even if it's just through the Internet."

In addition to sharing expertise with NGOs in places like eastern Europe, SHATIL is working closer to home with Palestinian NGOs.

"Having a strong NGO community in the Palestinian entity," Mazor said, "will ensure civil society and a strong democracy, which I think is in the interests of everybody in the region."

"THE DEATH OF DEATH:
Resurrection and Immortality in Jewish Thought"

Rabbi Neil Gillman, Scholar in Residence
(Professor of philosophy at the Jewish Theological Seminary)

In his book, "The Death of Death", Rabbi Gillman makes an original and compelling argument that Judaism, a religion often thought to pay little attention to the after life, not only offers us rich ideas on this subject - but delivers a deathblow to death itself.

SATURDAY, MAY 29, 1999

Rabbi Gillman will speak at our Shabbat Services where he will combine astute scholarship and historical, theological and liturgical insights while outlining the evolution of Jewish thought about bodily resurrection and spiritual immortality.

Rabbi Gillman will be our guest speaker during Shabbat Luncheon and then lead our studying during Se'udah Shlisheet.

SUNDAY, MAY 30, 1999

Rabbi Gillman will share some wisdom with us during breakfast following services at 9:00 a.m.
This will be co-sponsored by the Friendship Group.

This program will prove to be insightful to those interested in exploring the meaning of life, as well as the meaning of death.

This program is sponsored in part by the Morris and Sally Justein Endowment Fund and offered by the Adult Learning and Hesed Committees.

Reform launches outreach

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A practical demonstration of the meaning of mitzvah by hundreds of members of Reform temples in Toronto and Hamilton resulted in their performing diverse acts of kindness last week.

Members of all ages took part in an outreach effort to encourage mitzvah and volunteering in the community.

Families from Temple Anshe Shalom in Hamilton collected trash from the trails in the Royal Botanical Gardens, while families from Temple Sinai in Toronto helped clean up Moore Park and planted shrubs and trees there.

Some volunteers from Temple Sinai gave clothing, food and baked goods to Friends of the Shopping Bag Lady, while others prepared meals for Eva's Place, an emergency youth shelter.

Members of Anshe Shalom prepared meals for Wesley Centre, a shelter for the homeless in downtown Hamilton.

The senior youth group at Holy Blossom Temple washed car windows to raise funds for and awareness of youth poverty.

With 14 projects on the go, Anshe Shalom extended its mitzvah project for a week.

About 65 children, ranging in age from four to 13, heard a speech about needs of senior citizens in the former Soviet Union and then created a banner with messages of greeting to residents of Kiev. One of the messages read: "We care about Jews."

The Hamilton temple members visited Shalom Village, a Jewish home for seniors, and helped paint picture frames.

The theme of mitzvah day at Temple Emanu-El was child poverty, but there was concern shown for adults as well. A highlight was a presentation to volunteer of the year Dolores Wallis by Renee Bouthot, social action committee chair.

Ten organizations representing children and adults set up their own booths and benefited from members who signed up as volunteers and contributed gifts of clothing and bedding.

Those helped in this way were Campaign Against Child Poverty, Second Harvest, Delta Child Care, National Council of Jewish Women, Shalom Food Project, Jessie's Centre, Big Brothers/Sisters Associations, Kids Help Foundation and Eva's Place.

Parents and children attended a breakfast meeting at Temple Emanu-El to hear an address by June Callwood urging them to volunteer.

Children in the religious school made water color greeting cards, which they packaged and sold, donating the proceeds to Mazon Canada. Senior students in grades 7, 8 and 9 heard a talk on the Kids Help Foundation.

About 30 members of Temple Sinai did painting and wallpapering, and planted flowers at Juliette's Place for battered women.

Another 15 went to the Humane Society office on Lakeshore Road to stuff envelopes for a fund drive. Students in the religious school made greeting cards for Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, while a group of adults took 15 Reena members on a bowling outing.

Renee Bouthot (left), chair of Temple Emanu-El's social action committee, presents the Volunteer of the Year award to Dolores Wallis.

basis for public debate. The National Assembly is expected to shortly launch public hearings on the issue.

"If the government extends the notwithstanding clauses, it will have to provide new, credible reasons, in both moral and political terms, for continuing to grant priority to the rights and privileges of Catholics and Protestants over fundamental freedoms and the right to equality," the report states.

The task force believes that the current obligatory choice between Catholic, Protestant or secular moral instruction is discriminatory because it tends to marginalize students who are neither Catholic nor Protestant and to deprive them of instruction in any religion.

The task force rejected the model of offering all religious groups the equal right to have their own schools, or at least "specific-project" schools, within a neutral public system, if a majority of parents at a school wishes – a recommendation made by Canadian Jewish Congress in its brief.

Its reasons were that such a system would be "incompatible" with the goal of "promoting social cohesion by teaching students to live together" and would pose major administrative problems. Furthermore, the legality of such schools is "debatable" in light of the charters.

The task force also rejected making all schools completely secular, that is, offering no instruction on religion, and only moral education, because it feels religion is part of a well-rounded education and the preparation for good citizenship.

Advanced Torah study program for women planned

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Advanced Torah study for women will take a giant leap forward in Toronto with the establishment of Mekorot Institute of Torah Study for Women.

Mekorot will be launched officially on May 16, with a lecture for men and women by Arna Poupko, Judaic consultant of FEDERATION CJA of Montreal, entitled, Free to Choose? Submission vs. Personal Responsibility in Jewish Law.

The event, which is free of charge, will be held at Baycrest Terrace, at 8 p.m.

The mission statement says that the institute will offer "a program of serious Jewish learning...with the goal of making accessible to its students the full range of traditional Jewish texts.."

Toronto is not the first place to develop such a program, said Nadler, citing, for instance Drisha in New York, Mayan in Boston, and one in Silver Springs.

Board member Rebecca Nadler told The CJN that "as women are taking on more leadership and community roles, Jewish women have to be articulate and knowledgeable about Judaism. They become like that by mastering the texts."

Courses will be intended both for young women in the community who have been through day school and a year's study in Israel, for mature women and for women who have never studied Torah, and want to learn now.

Lecture courses

"University-educated professional women want learning at the same level [as they have experienced in other fields]" Nadler added.

There will be both full-term courses, and short, one-or-two lecture courses offered. The first full courses will be in Gemarah, Bible, philosophy and Navi (Prophets).

The shorter courses might deal with holidays or midrash, she said.

Nadler said that classes will be held both during the day and at night at different locations along the Bathurst corridor, to make the classes accessible to the greatest number of women. Courses will be suited to students with varying backgrounds, and taught in both Hebrew and English.

Many classes will include a chevruta component, where participants will study the texts in pairs, followed by a combination of lecture and interactive discussion with the instructor.

While the institute intends to be supported by tuition fees, it is actively fundraising, as well. Recently appointed executive director Roberta Newman announced that Mekorot has also received a grant from the Action Committee for Jewish Continuity of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

While the cost per semester will be $125, Nadler said that no one will be turned away.

The faculty will include Shoshana Zolty, Shoshana Kurtz, Rabbi Pinchas Brumer, Rabbi Yigal Gurevitz from CHAT, and Rabbi Moshe Shulman, of Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue. Officers are Nadler, Kurtz, Rachel Weinstock, and Janice Rotman-Goldstein.

'Today, the world is no longer silent': Wiesel

He recently agreed to an exclusive interview with The CJN.

Canadian Jewish News: Do you believe the military intervention of the 19 member countries of NATO will ultimately put an end to the murderous folly of Slobodan Milosevic?

Elie Wiesel: This is certainly a major change. In my day, the world was silent. Today, the world is no longer silent. If we had been able, in 1938-39, to count on the support of such an incredible alliance as the one established by NATO, we would certainly have prevented the angel of death from holding sway

I don't like war, and I have always been fiercely opposed to any sort of violence; nevertheless, I am in favor of the military campaign NATO is conducting against the Belgrade regime. It is essential that the democracies of the free world put an end to Milosevic's aggressive folly. Deporting a million innocent human beings, evicting them from their homes, burning their villages, destroying their hopes, these are crimes against humanity that we cannot continue to tolerate.

I am absolutely convinced that this coalition of democratic nations will succeed in forcing Milosevic to give in to the humanitarian demands dictated by the civilized world. At any price, the hundreds of thousands of persecuted Kosovar refugees must return home, and the western democracies must help them rebuild their ruined homes.

CJN: Since the beginning of the war in Kosovo, the State of Israel and many of the Jewish communities in the Diaspora have mobilized to offer humanitarian assistance to the victims of this tragedy. Did you expect such a show of solidarity?

E.W.: Since the beginning of the conflict, the Israelis and the Jews in the Diaspora have behaved admirably with respect to humanitarian aid for the Kosovars. The State of Israel dispatched medical teams to the area and sent medications, food, clothing... Israel even welcomed several hundred Muslim Kosovar refugees. It was symbolic perhaps, but it had to be done.

President Clinton recently told me at the White House how much he appreciated the remarkable cooperation and humanitarian solidarity of the activities undertaken by the Jewish community on behalf of the Albanian Kosovars, from the beginning of the conflict. Numerous fundraising activities to aid the crowds of refugees who have lost everything are currently taking place in the Jewish communities of the Diaspora. It's marvellous. It was necessary for us, the people of memory to do this. We have remained faithful to one of the primary requirements of the moral Jewish ethic.

CJN: More and more, we get the impression that becoming a nation means, above all, war and hateful inter-ethnic confrontation. Isn't this ancient lesson being forcefully taught again with the tragedy building up in the Balkans?

E.W.: Nationalism is synonymous with fanaticism. I believe nationalism is the scourge that will threaten the next century and the next millennium. Fanaticism and power together can become the most lethal of combinations. We see it today in the war in the Balkans.

It is true that each human being loves his native land. But patriotism pushed to the extreme and to excess often emerges as ruthless fanaticism. To express one's attachment to one's country is laudable. However, things begin to turn sour as soon as a nation adopts a condescending attitude to the other nations that surround it.

Patriotism can become ruthless fanaticism

When one nation considers itself as the most important nation in history, it tends to grant itself all rights, including the most despicable, such as that of occupying with impunity the territory of a neighboring country. Even nationalist claims of minorities within democratic countries, as in the case of the Irish and the Basques... can sink into violence and the murderous logic of terrorism. I believe, however, that we are moving towards internationalism and the disappearance of borders between countries.

CJN: Last November in Washington, you gave the inaugural address for the international conference on property stolen from the Jews during the Nazi era. You stressed the intellectual and moral dimensions of the work we must undertake to perpetuate the memory of the victims of the Shoah. Don't you have the impression that the financial dimensions of that horrible time are undermining that necessary duty of memory?

E.W.: Last year, I was asked to chair a commission to restore, to those eligible, the funds held in Swiss banks belonging to the Jewish victims of Nazism. I refused because I believe that it is not through financial compensation that we will restore the honor and the dignity of the Jews exterminated in the death camps. The real issue here is not money, but memory.

The steps being taken to restore the property taken from the Jews are an integral part of a major oeuvre of memory that is so important to the Jews. There is much misunderstanding in this affair. There is a lot of talk about the hundreds of millions of dollars and the large Jewish fortunes appropriated by the Nazis and their henchmen. But people forget that 99 percent of the Jewish victims of Nazism were poor. The rich families were only a small minority.

By speaking only of money, we are going to end up believing that all the European Jews were millionaires in the '40s, which was not at all true. It was not only the riches of the rich that were stolen, but also the poverty of the poor. They stole from the poor, their bodies and their most personal possessions, especially their hair. That is what we have to think about when we refer to memory, not to the millions of dollars of a few fortunate families.

But, at the same time, it is essential that the money belonging to the despoiled Jewish families be restored to their direct heirs or to the Jewish communities that are also their heirs. On the other hand, these financial claims must be made with sobriety and grace.

CJN: In Canada, the plan to build a museum dedicated to the memory of Jewish Holocaust victims recently gave rise to controversy. Several community groups – Armenians, Arabs, Vietnamese – wanted the memorial to honor the memory of the victims of all the genocides perpetrated throughout history. Doesn't such a request risk trivializing the unique nature of the Shoah?

E.W.: I hope that the Canadian Holocaust museum will be built. We must put an end to the current confusion. These comparisons undermine the singularity and the authenticity of the memory of the Jewish victims of Nazism.

The Holocaust is a Jewish tragedy with universal implications. Its universality rests in its uniqueness. Any attempt to dilute it or to extrapolate from it can only falsify its meaning. It is above all as a Jew that I remember that horrible tragedy. It is my duty. By doing this, I make others remember the drama of their own families.

For me, memory is not an instrument of exclusion and reduction, but rather one of openness and inclusion. Memory can only enrich by becoming deeper. In other words, the more the memory of a Jew is Jewish, the more it transcends in order to attain the universal.

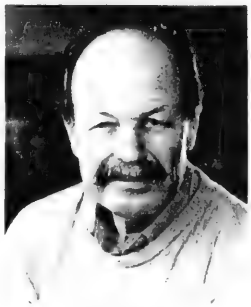
Archeologist scours biblical ruins

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter



Eliezer Oren

TORONTO — In a major excavation at a place in the western Negev Desert called Tel Haror, an Israeli archeologist is scouring the ruins of Gerar, the biblical site linked with the founding fathers of the Jewish people, Abraham and Isaac.

Eliezer Oren, holder of the Canada Chair in Near Eastern archeology at Ben-Gurion University in Beersheva, has been digging at Tel Haror since 1981.

Gerar, he said in an interview to mark the 10th anniversary of the Canada Chair, is closely identified with the Israelites, as well as with the Canaanites and the Philistines

At Tel Haror, which is midway between Beersheva and the Gaza Strip, Oren has found the remains of a settlement 16 hectares in size. It is from the Patriarchal epoch, and by archeological standards, is a huge town site.

The dig, which encompasses 4,500 years of history, is significant. "Tel Haror illuminates the early history of Israel and makes it real," explained Oren, founder of Ben-Gurion University's archeology division.

"Projects like this provide us with an indirect link to the past. It's a unique opportunity to touch the roots of early Jewish history."

Information about this era was, until recently, derived from biblical sources, which are not necessarily historically accurate, Oren said. But with the Tel Haror dig, new light has been and will be shed on the period, a prosperous and enlightened one, during which the alphabet emerged.

Oren and his team, consisting in part of students from North America, Europe and Australia, have found Israelite building materials, pottery and the bones of animals used in sacrificial rituals. "But no pig bones," he said. "It was already taboo."

They have also uncovered Philistine objects, and currently, they are poring over a large Canaanite temple which is yielding valuable clues about the Canaanites' religious beliefs.

The Tel Haror dig will go on for many years to come, said Oren, a graduate of the Hebrew University, University of Pennsylvania and the University of London.

A Sabra born in 1938, Oren wrote his PhD thesis on an ancient cemetery in the Israeli town of Beit Shean. This enabled him to study the burial customs of Semitic peoples such as the Canaanites and the Philistines.

From 1972 to 1978, he directed the Tel Sera excavation in the Negev. It is identified with the biblical settlement of Ziklag and with King David.

Oren was also in charge of a dig in the northern Sinai Peninsula from 1972 to 1982.

There, amid sand dunes, shifting sands and swamps, he dug up 1,300 settlement sites dating back to the Stone Age, including a fourth-century Roman-Jewish site which yielded coins bearing Hebrew letters.

He focused on this particular area because it was an important land bridge, a corridor joining Africa with Asia. "There was an open frontier between Canaan and Egypt."

In 1992, under the terms of Israel's 1979 peace treaty with Egypt, Oren returned nine truck loads of objects from Sinai numbering in the millions.

"I was criticized for returning them to Egypt, but I was in favor of it," he said. "We had to fulfill our treaty obligations, and we were interested in forming a collaborative relationship with Egypt."

Oren acknowledged that Israel's cultural relations with Egypt are skimpy. "But you never know. It could change in the future."

On May 6, the Canada Chair – which was funded by a group of Torontonians – plans to host a conference on current archeological developments in the Nile delta. Oren said that Egyptian archeologists were expected to attend the meeting.

Jewish community leader new U of M law dean

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Jewish community leader Harvey Secter has been appointed the new dean of law at the University of Manitoba.

When he takes up the post on July 1, Secter, 54, will bring a unique perspective to his new position. He has a business rather than a traditional academic or legal background. The law is a second career for the former businessman.

The Secter name is well known in Winnipeg's Jewish community. Harvey's late parents, Joe and Gwen (after whom the National Council of Jewish Women named its seniors' centre in north Winnipeg) were philanthropists and community leaders, a path that Harvey and his wife, Sondra, have also followed.

Harvey currently sits on the board of the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba and the Kanee Centre of the Sharon Home as well as on the boards of numerous other non-profit institutions in the general community.

Secter inherited the family business, Ricki's Canada, from his father. In partnership with his brother-in-law, Sam Guralnick, he built Ricki's from a local chain of 10 ladies' retail fashion stores into a 150-store national operation. He was also part of the ownership group of the Winnipeg Jets.

In 1988, he walked away from it all. "Twenty years seemed to be an awfully long time," he recalls. "It was time to move on, although I wasn't sure what I was moving on to. I decided to try law, not because I wanted to practise necessarily, but because it seemed to be an interesting diversion from commercial activity."

Harvey Secter excelled as a law student. Upon graduation in 1992, he won the Gold Medal. After articling and being called to the bar, he promptly retired as a practising lawyer. He went back to school, to Harvard, where he earned a master's degree in law, specializing in negotiation. He stayed at Harvard for an extra year as a visiting researcher in dispute resolution.

Since he and Sondra returned to Winnipeg in 1995, Secter has been teaching part time at the University of Manitoba Law School.

He has also been providing advice and training to public and private sector clients in conflict management and negotiation, through his company, Resolution Processes Inc.

The university first approached Secter, a popular teacher, last fall, about assuming the dean's post.

"I know I am still the new kid on the block," he says. "I bring the perspective of client, student and scholar to this role. I hope I am bringing a fresh outlook. I am looking forward to seeing where improvements can be made and what we can do differently. My approach though will be evolutionary, not revolutionary. There are a lot of talented and experienced people here. I look forward to working with them."

TORONTO HAS STRONG KOACH CONTINGENT

Tamara Kochberg (front, second from right) and 16 students from Toronto formed the largest contingent of any city at the Koach Kallah held recently in New Brunswick, N.J. Koach is the campus outreach department for the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism. The four-day conference, with scholars-in-residence Rabbis Neil Gillman and Joel Roth of the Jewish Theological Seminary, was attended by 115 students from across North America. Participants dealt with issues such as egalitarianism and the state of the Conservative (Masorti) movement in Israel, and took part in social action events such as helping at a soup kitchen or running an Oneg Shabbat for seniors.

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Perhaps some significant but unnoticed magnetic surge accounts for it, but Ottawa observers are re-calibrating their Global Positioning System units as they track the positions of various federal politicians on the ongoing crisis in the Balkans.

Less than 10 years ago, Lloyd Axworthy led the campaign of opposition to a military response to Saddam Hussein. He persuaded the Liberal party to oppose the Mulroney government's intention to join the Gulf War coalition. Axworthy's stand was echoed by Svend Robinson.

A decade later, one can scarcely recognize the two. As foreign minister, Lloyd Axworthy serves as the point man on Team Canada. Defending the military option in Yugoslavia, he has rejected all calls to pursue diplomacy or the more passive route of sanctions.

For his part, Robinson has, in the main, supported Canadian participation in the NATO bombing. Certainly he has been one of the more vocal defenders of the Kosovo Albanians for many months.

If we accept their current positions as sincere, how do we account for their extraordinary volte-face?

In the case of Svend Robinson, there has not been any change. He has always situated himself as the champion for and defender of human rights. For Robinson there has always been only one test. If a government's actions compromise a group's civil and human rights, he will oppose that regime. If military action represents the only way to protect those rights, he will endorse a military operation. It may be a simplistic approach, but at least it has been a consistent one.

Axworthy's is a little more complicated. Although he spent money and political capital to get a seat on the Security Council, he is frustrated with its impotence. Despite an inherent antipathy for the United States, he recognizes that Canada could not credibly choose a different path on this issue. Realpolitik has gotten in the way!

Like Robinson, though, Axworthy has really not changed. The difference is that with Robinson, the anchor has always been a concept – human rights. With Axworthy, the anchor relates to the approach. That means we can anticipate an effort by the foreign minister to reassert his left-of-centre leanings. What are the odds that they will find expression in Canada's position on the Israel-Palestinian peace process?

Ottawa Jews celebrate Israel's 51st anniversary

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Celebrations for Israel's 51st anniversary should be every bit as enthusiastic as those for the 50th anniversary, says the president of the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa/Vaad Ha'Ir.

"We must celebrate every day, every month and every year, not just the milestone occasions," Barbara Farber said at the conclusion of the Yom Hazikaron ceremony held recently at Machzikei Hadas synagogue.

Immediately following the Yom Hazikaron commemoration, hundreds of people danced and ate Israeli food, in celebration of Yom Ha'atzmaut.

The annual, community-wide event rotates among the city's largest synagogues, and is co-organized with the Soloway JCC.

The following morning, a flag-raising ceremony, attended by local politicians, representatives of various Jewish organizations, students from Hillel Academy and members of the public, was held outside the Joseph and Rose Ages Building.

In his welcoming remarks, Jeff Gould, president of the Soloway JCC said, "Today is indeed a time to rejoice, and we are happy to be here to do so."

"A flag is a symbol. In this specific case, besides referring to a sovereign country, it symbolizes the unity of the Jewish people, because long before it was adopted as the flag of the State of Israel, it was the flag uniting the Jewish people around the world," said Israel Ambassador David Sultan.

CJC statement on Kosovo sparks internal debate

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — To what extent, if any, should Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) be endorsing NATO's bombing of Yugoslavia?

At a recent meeting of CJC's national executive committee, there were no ready answers, given the context of a tragedy rife with complexities, where there are not necessarily obvious "good guys" and "bad guys," and where people have been at each other's throats for centuries.

The question arose, because on April 5, CJC issued a strong statement deploring the suffering that has resulted from Serbian President Slobodan Milosevic's policies concerning ethnic Albanians in Kosovo.

That was the easy part. But Congress went further, commending the Canadian government "for acting in concert through NATO" to end the ethnic cleansing, in effect endorsing NATO's tactics of bombing Yugoslavia.

"We stand in solidarity with the efforts of the brave men and women of the Canadian Armed Forces and we pray for their safe and speedy return," CJC president Moshe Ronen said in the statement.

By using such words, and thus taking an outright political position, the statement appeared to be a departure from CJC's traditional approach of addressing itself solely to the humanitarian concerns involved.

While there seemed to be a strong consensus at the meeting that they should deplore the ethnic cleansing and the suffering, and hope for a diplomatic resolution, there was no unanimity on the prudence of Congress' having adopted a "political" position.

One member warned that the Kosovar refugees might be compared to Palestinians.

Ronen noted that Belgrade Jews had condemned NATO's actions.

Others stressed that, notwithstanding the actions of Milosevic, this is not an ethnic conflict with an obvious right side and wrong side. Serbs, one executive member noted, had helped Jews during World War II, while Albanians had not.

Another member, Tom Kuttner, said a distinction had to be made between ethnic cleansing and population transfer.

"What's wrong," Kuttner said, "is the criminal way it is being carried out."

B.J. Finestone, a veteran both of the executive and of World War II, said, "We should speak out against abuses, but there's no right or wrong here. Everybody's wrong. We do not have to put ourselves in the position of being geo-politicians."

Still another member, Robert Presser, suggested that Congress had to be careful about "commenting on each NATO initiative."

He warned that if the situation evolved to the point of bringing in ground troops, which he believes is inevitable, it will produce a quick drop-off in public support.

Defenders of CJC's position on NATO noted that the issue of ethnic cleansing resonated with Jews for obvious reasons, and that, while Kosovo was no Holocaust, with no genocide taking place, now was not the time for CJC to be reticent, given the way the world stood idly by while Jews were being persecuted and slaughtered.

"If we had had NATO in 1933 or 1934," said national executive committee chair Manuel Schacter, "who knows how many human lives would have been saved?

"I would be appalled if Congress felt reluctant to intervene when there's a violation of human rights," he said.

Similarly, executive member Manuel Prutschi said that if CJC addressed itself only to the issue of humanitarian relief, it would be the "easy way out and the coward's way out.

"We have an obligation more than other people to speak out against crimes against humanity," he said.

Ronen said he believes the CJC response to the crisis in Kosovo has been "measured, unequivocal, and appropriate."

CJC, he indicated, would continue to denounce the policies of ethnic cleansing, while taking part in the efforts of world Jewry to provide humanitarian relief.

At the same time, he said, the organization would continue to emphasize the distinction between "ethnic cleansing" –a crime against humanity – and outright genocide, such as that perpetrated against the Jews.

"There's been brutal suffering, but we have to be careful about the language that's allowed to be used," he said.

"There was no refugee crisis during the Holocaust. The objectives and the means were the same: to kill people for the sake of killing people."

Jewish life after bar/bat mitzvah

On Oct. 27, we inaugurated The CJN Roundtable Discussion Series.

These discussions are an attempt to create an additional forum for the free-wheeling exchange of ideas on contemporary issues of importance to the Jewish community, locally, nationally and abroad. The proceedings of that initial roundtable, on the subject of The Jews of Toronto: Who we are and what we can be, were published in The CJN issue of Dec. 10, 1998.

We are pleased to publish in this issue, the proceedings of our second Roundtable, After Bar and Bat Mitzvah: Developing a Jewish life.

This discussion was held on March 9 at the Sephardic Kehila Centre in Thornhill. The panelists were: Rebecca Greenstein, OAC student, School of Liberal Arts; Susan Jackson, director of continuity, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto; and Richard Stoll, educator, Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

It attempted to arrive at answers to the question of how to reach out and "touch" our Jewish youth who, for various reasons, happen not to be part of, or even want to be part of the Jewish milieu.

By the end of the evening, it was clear to all participants that there were no clear-cut, neat, easily-implementable solutions to the many complex aspects of Jewish identity and Jewish involvement among our youth.

There will be more CJN Roundtable Discussions in the future. It is our hope that, with time, they will become a deeply-embedded and highly-anticipated part of the intellectual life of the community.

TORONTO — If there is a term used in Jewish communal life more often than continuity, then it must be the crisis of Jewish continuity.

With assimilation levels south of the border at all time highs, and with Canadian Jewry historically a generation behind the United States in sociological trends, Jewish leaders and laymen are increasingly viewing the future of the Jewish people with concern.

The teenage years, in particular, are seen as a key period in young peoples' lives during which an affiliation to Jewish life – or a distance from it – are often formed.

Will they stay connected to their Jewish heritage or will they drift away to other things?

Three speakers recently brought their unique perspectives to that troubling issue. Susan Jackson is director of continuity for the United Jewish Appeal, the community's main fundraising arm; Richard Stoll is teacher and assistant principal at CHAT; and Rebecca Greenstein is an OAC student at the School of Liberal Arts (SOLA).

They recently addressed The CJN's Roundtable on the topic: After Bar and Bat Mitzvah; Developing Jewish Life.

For Susan Jackson, a humorous story involving bats in a belfry – and in a shul – illustrates the difficulty in keeping young people committed to Jewish life.

A priest and minister were faced with the problem of ridding their churches' belfries of bats. After failing at every turn to get rid of the pesky rodents, a rabbi came up with a novel suggestion.

The shul also had a problem with a bat infestation, he told the Christian clergymen, so to get rid of them, he gave them a Jewish education and bar mitzvahed them all. As soon as that was over, they were gone, never to return.

With that little vignette, Jackson introduced two suggestions she believed could be useful in keeping the "bats," make that teenage Jews, linked to Jewish life after their bnei/bnot mitzvah.

Role modeling and exploring new aspects of Judaism are two key ingredients in keeping people interested in Jewish culture, she suggested.

"I'm a big proponent of what we all call role modeling. I think it isn't just parents role modeling for children, but children [or peers], role modeling for each other." That can be as simple as telling friends they will be attending an evening in which Jewish issues are discussed, she said.

Jackson pointed to her own life as an example. She got her start in community activities as an 8-year-old in Montreal, collecting UJA pledges door to door. Her whole family was involved in the project, and her father later served as a synagogue president.

"Role modeling was there. It was something that we did, something that we constantly saw. And we have to remember...it's not just our parents or our kids. It's our peers too [who can serve as role models], because that's an important part of the world."

Some role modeling can be acquired by "osmosis," like the child who emulates her mother blessing the Sabbath candles because that is something she was repeatedly exposed to, she continued.

"It is important to take what you got and things [you don't realize] you got, and pass them to the next generation," Jackson said. "Things do come down sometimes, even when we don't realize it. So our actions, in some cases, are even more important than words.

'Positive Judaism' essential

"You never know the things that stay with you, from your parents or your friends," she said. "So our behaviors and our actions sometimes are as important, or more important, than our words."

Jackson also referred to the importance of "positive Judaism," emphasizing that the celebration of Judaism should be presented to youngsters as a positive experience, with celebrations, holidays, places to go and things to see.

"Judaism is not a litany of mourning or a litany of Kaddish," she said.

She also suggested young people sometimes need a "kick in the rear end...to help teach them not to be afraid to try new things."

CHAT teacher Richard Stoll said it is only recently that the bar or bat mitzvah has been considered a retirement from active Jewish life, rather than a step toward further education and responsibility.

"Parents must put their children in situations where they develop an emotional response [to Jewish practice], he said, adding that the emotional response is what leads to continued commitment.

Stoll, a chaperon on the 1998 March of the Living, employed the acronym SIMPLE as a guide for maintaining Jewish life: Shabbat, Israel, March of the Living, Programming, Language study (Hebrew) and Education.

He quoted the Jewish writer Achad HaAm, who said that "more than Jews have kept Shabbat, Shabbat has kept the Jews." He stressed the importance of creating meaningful and appealing Shabbat experiences.

It is "indescribable" how a tour, a summer camp or time spent in an Israeli school can develop positive and lasting feelings toward the land and the people of Israel, he continued.

Stoll decried the attitude of some that the March of the Living is a misguided attempt to turn unconnected kids unto Judaism through negative means.

The March was "the most emotionally charged experience of my life," Stoll said. The trip was a window into the "past vibrant life" of European Jewry, and it provided lessons about the abiding significance of Israel.

He encouraged the development of programs that children and adults can enjoy together.

Turning to religious texts, Stoll said they encourage ongoing learning and are "best understood in the original language...Imagine the feeling someone has when they realize that they are asking the same question as Rashi did," he said.

Finally, said Stoll, education must be continual and ongoing – and not only in a formal, institutional setting. "Why not send your kids to Jewish camp instead of to a camp that Jews go to?" Kids in camp learn in a "social and fun way," he said.

Sending children to a Jewish high school is vital, said Stoll. "High school is where children develop critical thinking. They enter as children and leave as adults."

He quoted a recent study of Jewish young people which said "there is a [correlation] between [being a] day school graduate and having negative feelings towards intermarriage and positive ones toward involvement with the Jewish community."

At the beginning of his speech, he told the old story about an elderly lady who went on a pilgrimage to see a famous guru in India. After overcoming many hardships, she was told she could say three words to him. The words she chose? "Come home Sheldon!"

"Let us hope that our kids will identify with the mother, rather than with Sheldon," he concluded.

For OAC student Rebecca Greenstein, the terms secular and Reform have "often been perceived as somehow undercutting my commitment to Judaism.

"Secularized Jews such as myself," she said, "are as valid a modern Jewish phenomenon as any other member of our increasingly diverse faith."

Greenstein believes that the future of Judaism lies in the hands of the individual. Her personal contribution lies in faith and spirituality, rather than observance, she said.

Participating in the 1998 March of the Living was a turning point for her. "I built connections with people with whom my only link was Judaism," she said.

"After my return from that unbelievable odyssey into my past, I learned to fight any apathy or sadness in my life with the knowledge that the Jewish chain is only as strong as its weakest link, and that I didn't feel that as a promising young woman, I of all people should be the source of weakness."

Panel responds to concerns about youth

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As with most matters spiritual, there were more questions than answers at the recent CJN Roundtable, but panelists did their best to reassure Jewish youth of their place in the community.

To the broad query of how does Jewish youth know what it wants, Richard Stoll said a vacuum often appears in young people naturally, when the time is right in a person's development.

It's hoped, he said, that a young person in search of religious fulfillment would find what he or she wants amid the myriad of services, organizations and outreach groups in Toronto.

Susan Jackson said she has noted that many young Jews are "hopping on the bandwagon of Jewish education." But, she cautioned, there is an invisible layer of young Jews, unexposed to Judaism, unaffiliated and unattracted to current programming.

"It's hard to target people when you don't know where they are. It's hard for kids to learn something they have never seen," she said.

Rebecca Greenstein admitted what many parents know: Teenagers lead full lives and their priorities lean toward self-fulfillment.

"Often, we're so self-absorbed that we have no need for spirituality. [But] one day you wake up and you start wondering about life." Judaism, she said, can give someone "a reason to get out of bed in the morning."

One questioner wondered about young people who have had bad experiences with Jewish programs, and how that could turn someone off for years.

Panelists agreed the issue goes back to Jewish education. A solid foundation, they said, can prepare and help shield a person from a bad experience. But maturity of years can also soften bad memories.

Greenstein offered: "When you're younger, religion is brought to you. When you're older, you have to go to religion. When the time is right, you go back to religion."

One audience member, an Orthodox teen, who said she was turned off by religious fanaticism, suggested that young people should be exposed to Judaism a little at a time, or else they could be lost for good.

Stoll agreed, saying "anything that is acquired suddenly can be lost as suddenly."

Greenstein, who had spoken about her experiences on the March of the Living, was asked about programs on a smaller, less dramatic and less intense level.

Organizations like B'nai Brith Youth Organization (BBYO); North Eastern Lakes Federation of Temple Youth (NELFTY), campus groups and other synagogue-affiliated groups offer a wide cross-section of programs, Greenstein noted.

Jackson stated the problem could lie with the paucity of afternoon and Sunday classes. She said there is a "huge" movement in Toronto to start a community-supported afternoon school for teens.

In response to one young woman's query about those kids who don't attend day or afternoon classes, or go on the March of the Living, Stoll said that "in many ways, Israel is the answer" for those who have little or no exposure to Judaism.

Unaffiliated young adults can also take advantage of classes and programs at the Bathurst Jewish Centre, Aish HaTorah and Kolel: a Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning and other outreach organizations, the panel noted.

One young man said he finds there is too much emphasis in the community on the various streams of Judaism, and their differences.

Stoll said it's important not to follow dogma blindly. "Sometimes, doing what's counter-intuitive can reap rewards," he said. "We have to do away with labels and categories."

Change, panelists agreed, is a slow process and comes in small increments.

Greenstein perhaps best summed it up: "One day, something will hit you and make a personal connection."

Shmuel Carmeli: Making the Grade

At age 19, a commander in the tank corps during the Yom Kippur war, Shmuel Carmeli's life took a tragic turn.

As he was moving towards the Suez, unfazed by an earlier attack on his tank, an anti-tank missile found its mark. It left Shmuel unconscious and paralyzed.

Encouraged by two successful surgeries to remove shrapnel from his spine, Shmuel was told that he would again have use of his legs. Hope however faded as days in a wheelchair turned into months. Determined, with the aid of braces and Beit Halochem, it took three long and painful years to Shmuel to walk again.

Plenty of available time and limited career choices enabled Shmuel to earn his Ph.D. in chemistry and he is now a senior lecturer at Tel Aviv University. Shmuel, a married father of three, is a fine example of Beit Halochem's success.

Canadian professor awarded Wolf Prize in chemistry

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Raymond Lemieux, a professor emeritus at the University of Alberta, is no stranger to accolades and awards.

This week, Lemieux was to be presented with the prestigious Wolf Prize in chemistry by Israeli President Ezer Weizman, at a special ceremony at the Knesset.

Lemieux was also honored at a recent luncheon hosted by David Sultan, the Israeli ambassador to Canada, and Henri Rothschild, president of the Canada-Israel Research and Development Foundation.

The luncheon, attended by senior public servants, scientists and academics, members of Parliament and the Senate, as well as representatives of various Jewish organizations, was an opportunity for the Canadian diplomatic and scientific communities to pay tribute to Lemieux.

"Not only has he honored himself, but through him we are all honored as Canadians," Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray said of Lemieux. "We appreciate, as Canadians, the honor given to a fellow citizen by the Wolf Foundation."

The Wolf Prize was established in 1978 by the late German-born Ricardo Wolf, who served for many years as the Cuban ambassador to Israel. The prize is awarded annually to outstanding scientists and artists.

Work has had important medical applications

In a career spanning half a century, Lemieux has contributed significantly to the study of the chemistry of carbohydrates. Some of his work, including fundamental studies on complex carbohydrate-protein interactions and molecular recognition, has important medical and medicinal applications.

In his remarks at the luncheon, Lemieux, the recipient of the Canada Gold Medal for Science and Engineering and the Order of Canada, recalled the honor of being named Man of the Year by B'nai Brith in Saskatoon for his work on the synthesis of sugar. "I am now going to the very heart of the Jewish world to be honored again," he said.

This trip to Israel will be Lemieux's second. In 1982, while serving on the Canadian advisory board of the Weizmann Institute for Science, he was invited to spend two weeks at the institute as a visiting scientist.

A native of Lac La Biche, Alta., Lemieux held positions at the National Research Council and the universities of Saskatchewan and Ottawa, before chairing the organic chemistry division of the University of Alberta. He retired 14 years ago.

Dr. Moshe Schnitzer, a recent recipient of the Wolf Prize for his work in soil chemistry, was also recognized by Rothschild at the luncheon.

Gerald Rose was a leader in Saskatchewan community

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Gerald Rose, a powerhouse volunteer and leader of Saskatchewan's Jewish community, died in Saskatoon recently of cancer. He was 78.

Obituary

Rose died just three weeks before he was to be invested into the Order of Canada for his 50 years of communal service. The honor was picked up at the Ottawa ceremony on his behalf by his wife of 53 years, Gladys.

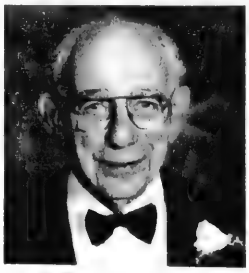
Rose was involved in a myriad of community activities, including Saskatoon's B'nai Brith lodge, the Rotary Club, the Heart and Stroke Foundation and St. Paul's Hospital's board of management. Following his death, the flag at St. Paul's flew at half-mast in his honor.

Helped launch foundation

But one of his proudest achievements, says his family, was establishing the Saskatoon Jewish Foundation in 1986, inspired, in part, by a CJN article on the Jewish community in Quebec City, which had dwindled to the point where remaining members were forced to sell their synagogue.

Determined that Saskatoon's 170 Jewish families would not meet the same fate, Rose set up the foundation to ensure the community's financial viability. It has helped Jewish youth, for example, attend summer camps and other activities.

He was regarded as one of Saskatoon's most visible boosters. His administrative skills were tapped when he served as vice-president for the 1979 Western Canada Summer Games, the 1989 Canada Games and the 1992 Canadian Special Olympics Winter Games.



Gerald Rose

Rose was born in Saskatoon to parents who had migrated north from Duluth, Minn. His father, who was born in Romania, started a dry-cleaning and fur business, Arthur Rose Ltd., which Gerald joined following his World War II service in the Royal Canadian Signal Corps, stationed in Aldershot, England.

By then, he had graduated from the University of Saskatchewan with a degree in chemistry. He married Gladys Sarlin in 1946 and they raised three daughters and a son.

Rose ran the family business until retiring in 1985.

He believed strongly in tzedakah, said his wife, who served two terms as president of Saskatoon's Congregation Agudas Israel, which the couple joined the year they were married.

Gladys Rose was also chair of Canadian Jewish Congress's Saskatchewan region.

So numerous were her husband's volunteer activities that he rarely had time for his hobbies, bridge and golf. "He played golf for 50 years and he used to say that his game never improved in all that time," she said.

Over the years, Rose donated time to several home and school associations, the Saskatoon Economic Development Board, and the St. Thomas Moore College Corp.

He was awarded with his B'nai Brith lodge's We Are Proud of You citation, and twice with the City of Saskatoon's Certificate of Distinguished Community Service.

In 1988, he was inducted into the Saskatoon Business Hall of Fame.

Rose was eulogized by Sidney Buckwold of Saskatoon, also an Order of Canada inductee, and by Grant Scharfstein, president of Congregation Agudas Israel.

Rose is survived by his wife, daughters Kathryn Cooper, Toby and Naomi, and son David, all of Toronto, as well as 13 grandchildren.

As we approach Mother's Day, it's appropriate that we reflect on recent trends in the law that appear to give women greater economic security. In the very recent Supreme Court of Canada decision of Bracklow, the Court formally extended the ability of a spouse to claim spousal support, even where a woman's financial needs and plight did not arise from the marriage. (Lawyers can find this case on Quicklaw at [1999] S.C.J. No. 14.)

The Bracklows lived together for about seven years and were married only for the last three. They had no children, and had both been previously married. Mrs. Bracklow had her own career. Prior to the marriage, Mrs. Bracklow was sick with psychological and other medical problems that became progressively worse — and finally work-disabling — at the end of their relationship.

The British Columbia Court of Appeal ruled that since the marriage did not cause Mrs. Bracklow's financial problems or have any connection to them, the husband was not obliged to "compensate" Mrs. Bracklow with spousal support. For instance, had Mrs. Bracklow worked to raise children and clean toilets while her husband was improving his ability to earn money from year to year, it would have been unfair not to compensate her for being out of the work force by reason of the marriage. The Appeal Court therefore denied Mrs. Bracklow an entitlement to support.

Relationship alone deemed grounds for support if spouse in need

However, Madame Justice McLaughlin of the Supreme Court of Canada overruled the British Columbia Court of Appeal. In a lengthy and philosophical decision, she clarified the law by ruling that although the mere fact of marriage itself does not entitle a spouse to support, the relationship does if a spouse is in need and the partner spouse is able to pay.

The Court ruled that there are three ways in which a spouse can claim support:

(a) By express or implied contract — i.e. a prenuptial agreement or understanding that support will be paid in the event of a breakdown in the marriage;

(b) Compensatory support (where compensation is paid for "services rendered" and lost opportunity in the work force. Justice McLaughlin called this the "clean break" model or theory of marriage, where each party is independent, not interdependent, but on marriage breakdown the spouse disadvantaged by the relationship needs to be compensated; and

(c) non-compensatory support.

The Court awarded support to Mrs. Bracklow under the umbrella of non-compensatory support since the couple had become interdependent during the course of their relationship, even though they kept separate bank accounts and had separate careers until the last part of the marriage, when Mrs. Bracklow's medical condition deteriorated.

When asking for spousal support, Mrs. Bracklow now also was able to rely on the existence of the relationship in and of itself and the history of interdependency. She did not have to prove that her disability or inability to work or financial need related to the marriage.

Non-support agreements can be superseded

In light of this decision, it is hard to imagine when a spouse in need will not be entitled to spousal support, irrespective of the length of their marriage or pre-marital state. Even in the face of a prenuptial contract where a spouse has agreed never to seek such support, several cases have now ruled that such contracts are but one factor the Courts consider when ruling on the issue. If a spouse is in need, particularly on public assistance, it can still order support even with an agreement to the contrary in place.

The Court refused to determine the quantity of support for the Bracklows, and sent the case back to the trial judge to arrive at a figure. The Court did, however, make some related determinations — one of which has far-reaching repercussions — that we'll examine in the May 27 issue of the CJN.

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Babies born to mothers that are addicted to alcohol or cocaine can now be identified and helped to better health.

This is one of the reasons Israeli-born Dr. Gideon Koren took on the job of heading Canada's first chair in health research at the Hospital for Sick Children (HSC).

The CIBC Wood Gundy Children's Miracle Foundation Chair was set up, thanks to a $2 million gift from the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce (CIBC).

Koren, head of clinical pharmacology and toxicology at HSC, told The CJN that even if the mother denies she is addicted to alcohol or cocaine, medical examination of the baby's hair will tell whether the newborn is affected.

In some cases, he said, these babies must be taken over by the Children's Aid Society, the Catholic Children's Aid or the Jewish Family and Child Service.

But all these babies can be helped in their first or second year of life by a special stimulation program to activate their brain cells.

"In early life, we find that their brains are so plastic that they can be helped," he said.

Even when such children are older and in a special education program at school, they can be helped to overcome the disabilities which are passed on by the mother's addiction.

Koren doubts that an education program will do much to end the addiction of mothers to alcohol or other drugs.

He puts more faith in a contraceptive, implanted under the skin of a woman at risk, that can last up to five years and be removed at the woman's option.

Too many drugs are being given to children today, Koren said. "Remember, these drugs were developed for adults in the first place. Of course, there is a tendency to see if they will help children, but there is a risk attached."

"We used to ask whether a child would be cured of his cancer. Now we also ask what the quality of life will be for the child after having been treated with very toxic medications."

The new chair will enable researchers to use evidence-based medicine in evaluating children's health, as is done with adults.

Practices will be considered from a clinical, fiscal, ethical and social point of view.

"We've already been able to recruit new child heath researchers because of the chair," Dr. Koren said. "These [include] a specialist in health services research, and a health economist who is investigating the cost of health and disease in children."

At the ceremony inaugurating the chair, Al Flood, chair and CEO of CIBC, said it is hoped that it will produce benefits for child health.

Plastic surgery can mask hidden problems

TORONTO — Plastic surgery, the modern route to the fountain of youth, can sometimes mask problems, warns Dr. Allan Peterkin, a psychiatrist at Mount Sinai Hospital.

To Your Health

"There are a lot of good reasons to have esthetic changes done, to produce a more confident image, an expression of healthy self esteem.

"But sometimes the person contemplating such procedures has profound inner self-esteem issues. They think a procedure will remedy that. But it's not the cure of the problem."

Peterkin says there are warning signs which potential patients, their families and friends should be aware of, and try to resolve, before a procedure is undertaken.

He advises patients to discuss the advantages and pitfalls of such procedures beforehand.

He notes that some people arrange to have the procedure at a bad time in their life, ignoring other health concerns or financial problems. Others have unrealistic expectations of what change the surgery can achieve, or they are having it for the benefit or at the request of someone else.

He says individuals who act in a compulsive nature and subscribe to numerous procedures are also a source of concern.

He recommends that those with alcohol or drug problems, or who suffer from depression, seek other forms of assistance before considering a permanent, altering procedure.

Symposium planned

These kinds of issues are often identified by plastic surgeons before procedures take place; surgeries are delayed or postponed until the issues are dealt with, says Peterkin.

"I think the plastic surgeons are good at getting a sense of the patient's reasons [for plastic surgery]. If they think there's a problem they might suggest the patient have a psychiatric consultation first. The surgeons are good at determining who's a good candidate [for surgery]."

As for new trends in the field, Peterkin says he believes more men are having procedures done.

"Businessmen are having more procedures for competitive reasons, to reflect a successful man on the rise. They covet an energetic, healthy image, they're active socially or in their careers and want the outside appearance to reflect that."

Peterkin is one of the keynote speakers at Mount Sinai Hospital Auxiliary's Eighth Symposium on Women and Health, which takes place May 6, at the St. Lawrence Centre.

Other speakers include Dr. Alastair Carruthers, a dermatologist; Victoria Sutherland, founder of Victoria Spa; Dr. Marla Shapiro, a family physician; Dr. Michael Kreidstein, a plastic surgeon; and Alysse Fogel, a consulting dietician and dietician/nutritionist.

London Jews on alert after bombings

By SHARON SADEH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — Police have warned all Londoners to be on the alert for bombs after a murderous attack on a gay pub in central London, the third bombing aimed at minorities in less than three weeks.

Security experts said there had been a significant increase in the Jewish community's state of alert, including the enlistment of volunteers to stand guard at Jewish establishments in the city.

Last Friday's explosion in the Admiral Duncan pub in the heart of Soho, London's restaurant district, killed two people and injured at least 70 others. Twenty people remained hospitalized Saturday morning, at least four in critical condition.

"This is a time for calm. It is a time for vigilance. It is a time for the community [to be] working together to defeat these cowards," said Police Chief Paul Condon hours after the device went off at about 6:35 p.m. Police said they believed the blast was linked to two other nail bombs that injured dozens in minority neighborhoods in the past two weeks.

Scotland Yard arrested a man in Cove, southwest of London, early yesterday, in connection with the bomb attacks, but refused to provide any further details. It was unclear if the arrest was directly connected to Friday's attack or if police believe the man may be linked to all three bombings. Two other men were arrested Friday in connection with the first bombing attack in Brixton, a largely black community. A third man was also arrested Friday in connection with the attacks, police revealed yesterday.

The latest bombing occurred in Soho, which is especially busy on Friday nights. Last Friday, the area was even more crowded, as thousands enjoyed the balmy start of a three-day weekend. Many were maimed, and scores of injured filled the glass-strewn streets as sirens wailed and ambulances threaded their way through traffic trying to reach the scene, which adjoins Chinatown and the theatre district.

The White Wolves, a racist group that has threatened Jews and blacks, claimed responsibility in a phone call to the BBC two hours after the blast.

Combat 18, a right-wing extremist group, claimed responsibility for the previous bombs on April 17 and 24, which targeted a largely black and a Bangladeshi neighborhood.

"Clearly, they are linked. Clearly, they are hate devices," Condon said. "It is an attack on us all, and we must work together to catch these people as soon as possible."

Since the attackers appear to be making their way through London's minorities, the Jewish community acknowledged their fears. "We are concerned, but I hope that the precautions we have put into effect will stop anything from happening," said Mike Whine, a security expert for the British Board of Jewish Deputies.

The British police increased cooperation with Jewish organizations two weeks ago, warning prominent Jewish figures in the United Kingdom to be on the alert.

So far, some 25 complaints have come in from Jewish community leaders reporting threats. "As a minority, we live under a constant threat, and if nothing happens in the next few days that doesn't mean we should relax our vigilance," a spokesperson for the London Board of Deputies said.

Palestinians delay statehood declaration

BY NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — PLO leaders last week voted unilaterally to delay the declaration of a Palestinian state, amid heavy international pressure to put off the move.

On the third day of deliberations in Gaza, the Palestinian Central Council, the mini-parliament of the PLO, overwhelmingly voted to put off the declaration until after Israel's elections.

At the same time, it arranged for subcommittees to work on various aspects of statehood, including drawing up a draft constitution. Salim Za'anoun, chair of the council, said the body would reconvene at the beginning of June.

The U.S. State Department welcomed the decision. "We have said that we think it is very important for neither the Palestinians, nor the Israelis, to pursue unilateral acts or declarations," James Rubin said. "The only realistic way for the Palestinians to achieve their aspirations is through a negotiated outcome."

Palestinian Authority leader Yasser Arafat had long pledged to declare an independent state on May 4, 1999, the date interim peace accords expire under the terms of the Oslo accords, if no final-status arrangement with Israel was concluded by then.

The United States, Europe and Arab states had strongly urged Arafat to delay a declaration because it could harm efforts to resume peace negotiations that have been faltering since December.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu had suspended implementation of the U.S.-brokered Wye memorandum, including all further troop redeployments, claiming the Palestinians were violating the accords.

Netanyahu had warned the Palestinians that Israel would respond to a statehood declaration by annexing parts of the West Bank.

Israel Election Notebook
May 17

By SHAHAR ILAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Shas leader Aryeh Deri yesterday apologized for implying in a video released last week that the Jerusalem District Court treated him like a Nazi. .

Deri, speaking at a Jerusalem press conference, said his comparison of his trial to that of Adolf Eichmann and John Demjanjuk related only to the live broadcast of the verdict.

"If, God forbid, someone understood me to mean that the court judged me like a Nazi, I apologize," he said. "The court judged me as Aryeh Deri, the Moroccan – not as a Nazi."

Deri then proceeded to launch a renewed attack on both the courts and large swaths of Israel's political spectrum as if to imply that being treated as a Moroccan was not much better.

However, "[the courts] are conducting religious and sectoral persecution against us, and the combination is fatal, because those who fear the spread of religion in the country know that the only movement capable of reaching every place in Israel is Shas," he said.

Deri also attacked the Labor party, for its belated response to actress Tikki Dayan's insulting remarks about Likud supporters on Friday.

"If [party leader Ehud] Barak took 24 hours to apologize for Tikki Dayan's statements, I have no doubt that this is what they really think – that Shas represents 'a rabble' and 'a separate nation,' and they have an argument with the culture of this 'rabble' and this 'separate nation.'

"I understand that they asked forgiveness... [but] they are asking for pardon, because they think [Dayan's statements] will cause them political harm."

He also disparaged Dayan, by saying: "There is always one token Sephardi adopted [by the establishment] who tries to find favor with the gang. Apparently, she has an inferiority complex."

Yisrael b'Aliyah was the next political party on the hit list. Its campaign broadcasts – most have attacked the Shas-run Interior Ministry – are "a mark of shame on the party's leaders," Deri said.

"They are inciting the Russian community against the Sephardim. They have taken the great risk of [creating] a rift in the nation and even civil war.

"For Shas, this is a gift from heaven, because it has united the Sephardi public... Every time someone mentions Yisrael b'Aliyah or [party leader Natan] Sharansky at one of our rallies, there is fire in the room."

Deri also had harsh words for several senior Likud MKs who had criticized Shas' "bear hug" of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

"If the Likud doesn't want us to support Netanyahu, they should tell us," he said. "It would save us a lot of work."

Finally, Deri lashed out at President Ezer Weizman and State Comptroller Eliezer Goldberg for criticizing his video without even seeing it.

Drafted by the IDF

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Military Correspondent

JERUSALEM — Of those Israelis who are of draft age, 80 percent of the men and 62 percent of the women will serve in the IDF this year, the head of the army's human resources branch said recently.

The percentages are about the same as those of last year, said Major General Yehuda Segev, adding that he expects the figures and the reasons for the exemptions to "remain stable" over the next two years as well.

Eight percent of the men were exempted from service because they are yeshiva students "whose occupation is Torah study," and three percent each were exempted due to medical, psychological and "substandard profile" reasons. Those with substandard profiles usually have a criminal record or an inadequate education.

Another three percent of the potential draftees have emigrated or are abroad.

Of the women, 26 percent received exemptions for religious reasons, four percent due to a substandard profile, four percent because they are abroad and two percent each for medical reasons or because they are married.

The motivation factor – referring to the proportion of draftees who are ready to serve in combat units – also remained stable following the large decrease from 1994 to 1996. In 1996, only 49 percent of twelfth-grade students who were fit for combat service, said that they had a desire to serve in combat units. By 1998, this number had risen to 59 percent.

Seventy-five percent of the soldiers who were assigned to combat service in March 1999 said it was what they wanted, the same as in the past two years, but up from 68 percent in 1996. Segev said that the IDF cannot be satisfied with this level of motivation, and if the drive to enhance the draftees' motivation is not intensified, "We could find ourselves back in the situation of 1996."

Not if we can help it.

Some say that Israeli Jews must choose between secular laws and Torah laws, between modernity and tradition, between different sides in a winner-take-all "culture war."

At Bar-Ilan University, we disagree. Our 25,000 Jewish students – half of them observant, half of them not – learn to respect both Judaism and democracy, to apply ancient wisdom to modern challenges. They study Thomas Jefferson and the Talmud, Philo and theoretical physics, Isaiah and artificial intelligence.

More importantly, they learn to respect each other. They socialize and study together. In secular-religious dialogues, they search together for concrete solutions to the issues that divide our people.

Isn't it time for the rest of the Jewish people to stop pointing fingers and to start joining hands?

We think so. That's why our faculty works with secular and religious high schools in Israel to nurture tolerance and respect for different value systems. That's why our new International Center for Jewish Identity is using the Internet to address the alienation of Jewish youth all over the world from their heritage.

If you want to learn more about how we are helping Jews work together for our collective future, please write to: Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University, 1750 Steeles Ave. West, Suite 214, Concord, Ontario L4K 2L7. Or call 905-660-3563. Or e-mail: barilanc@inforamp.net.

Arab candidate may be a spoiler

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Israeli Arabs, comprising 20 percent of Israel's population and upwards of 500,000 of its eligible voters, might play a decisive role in the May 17 election. They could determine who will be Israel's next prime minister.

Mideast Analysis

Almost two months ago, Azmi Bishara, a Christian Arab from Nazareth, announced his intention to challenge Benjamin Netanyahu and Ehud Barak, the two main contenders in the race for prime minister. An academic, Bishara is the first Israeli Arab to run for that position.

Azmi Bishara

Though realistically not expected to win, Bishara believes that he can make a difference by endorsing the candidate who sincerely commits himself to improving the lot of Israeli Arabs.

Leaders of the two main Israeli Arab parties – Hadash and the United Arab List – have implored Bishara to drop out. So has Yasser Arafat, the president of the Palestinian Authority.

They fear that his candidacy may rob Barak of the chance to beat Netanyahu in the first or second round. In the 1996 election, Netanyahu squeaked through by a razor-thin margin of 29,457. But Bishara, a member of the Knesset who ran on an independent ticket, has so far rejected the entreaties.

One can understand why Bishara could be a spoiler. In the last election, 95 percent of the Israeli Arab electorate cast their ballots for Shimon Peres, the Labor party candidate, while five percent voted for Netanyahu, the Likud candidate. But if Bishara remains in the race, he could easily siphon away votes from Barak.

It is already an exceedingly tight contest, all the more so since two other politicians have thrown their hats into the ring: the Centre party's Yitzhak Mordechai, Netanyahu's former defence minister, and the far right's Ze'ev Begin, his former science minister.

A Dahaf/Yediot Achronot poll released on April 30 found that 39 percent of the electorate would vote for Barak, 36 percent for Netanyahu, eight percent for Mordechai, three percent for Begin and three percent for Bishara. Eleven percent were undecided.

It's clear what this arithmetic means. In all probability, no single candidate will triumph in the first round on May 17. Yet, if Bishara rallies unequivocably behind Barak, he could theoretically tip the balance in his favor, particularly if there is a runoff on June 1.

Cognizant of this dynamic, all the candidates have appealed directly to Israeli Arabs, grandiloquently promising to improve conditions in the Arab sector. (At present, 10 Israeli Arabs sit in the Knesset. Three MKs represent Zionist parties – Labor, Likud and Meretz – and the remainder are divided between two non-Zionist coalitions: the United Arab List and the Democratic Front for Peace and Equality, which is otherwise known as Hadash).

Though equal under the law, Israeli Arabs are second class citizens because they do not have access to the same privileges, services and opportunities as Jews.

Bishara's platform calls for increased budgets to Arab municipalities and schools, the supply of public services to Arab hamlets which lack electricity, water and sewers, the appointment of Arabs to the boards of major state corporations, and a halt to land expropriation.

In theory, the top three candidates – Barak, Netanyahu and Mordechai – have no problem with these demands.

Barak has acknowledged the existence of "deep inequality in the country." Netanyahu has committed himself to creating "equal opportunity and closing the gap." Mordechai has promised to draw up a five-year plan to upgrade roads and sewage systems in Arab communities and to appoint an Israeli Arab minister to the cabinet.

Arab voters have heard all this before in previous campaigns, and precious little was done after the election, causing deep-seated resentment and discontent.

This time, given Bishara's leverage, meaningful improvements could be in the offing. And if they do materialize, Bishara will rightly be able to take some of the credit.

April 26

• Israel and China have made "remarkable achievements" in bilateral economic, agricultural and technological exchanges, China's president said during a meeting in Beijing with visiting Israeli President Ezer Weizman. Jiang Zemin also spoke of the "long history of friendship" between the Chinese and the Jewish people. (Members of the Israeli delegation subsequently signed business deals worth a reported $95 million US.)

April 27

• Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat freed from jail three Islamic militants involved in a series of suicide bus bombings in Israel.

April 28

• Palestinian police wounded an Israeli soldier near Jenin. Witnesses said the shooting occurred after the car they were travelling in entered the Palestinian self-rule area accidentally.

• Israel categorically rejected a UN committee resolution calling for Palestinian self-determination based on 1947 General Assembly Resolution 181 that called for the division of Jerusalem. The United States was the only country on the human rights committee to oppose the decision. Canada abstained.

April 29

• Israeli prosecutors are considering opening a criminal investigation into those responsible for producing a videotape in which convicted politician Aryeh Deri compares the treatment he received during this trial to that of Nazi criminals. Deri was sentenced earlier this month to four years in jail for bribe-taking, fraud and breach of trust.

• Defence Minister Moshe Arens told a think tank in Washington he holds little hope for rapid progress in Israeli-Palestinian talks.

April 30

• Unemployment rose by one percent in February to 198,000 people, the Central Bureau of Statistics reported. The jobless rate climbed to 8.7 percent after remaining at about 8.5 percent through the second half of 1998.

Serbian Jews find temporary refuge in Budapest

By EDWARD SEROTTA
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUDAPEST — On March 22, Aca Singer, 70, thin and silver-haired, picked up the telephone in his Belgrade office and dialed a number in Budapest, where he was connected with Gusztav Zoltai, a man 10 years his junior.

Speaking in Hungarian, Singer told Zoltai that the plan they had laid out the previous October was ready to be implemented. Zoltai jotted down a few details, hung up the phone, and set the plan in motion.

When the history of the war in Kosovo is written, the plan these two men initiated will barely earn a footnote. Still, Singer and Zoltai have written a short, remarkable chapter in post-Holocaust Jewish history.

For the first time in half a century, a central European Jewish community has taken the lead in helping to rescue a neighboring Jewish community in desperate need.

The work was spearheaded by two Holocaust survivors, both of whom had lost their entire families. These men wanted to be sure the words "never again" had meaning in their communities.

The first bus rented by the Serb Jewish community pulled up to the Hungarian border at Szeged just after noon on March 23 and found a representative from the Budapest community waiting for them. More buses came in the days to follow, bringing a total of 160 Jews by week's end. By mid-April, that number had doubled again.

Jews say they are not fleeing Serbia because of anti-Semitism. They say it is simply a matter of self-preservation during the constant NATO bombings.

In Budapest, the entire Balint Jewish Community Centre on Revai Street had been turned into makeshift dorm rooms, a soup kitchen and lounges in anticipation of the Serbian Jews' arrival.

But as the numbers grew, the facilities were strained and a hotel on the outskirts of town was used. It too, proved inadequate. Now the Serbian Jews, most of whom are children, women and elderly, are being housed in the Park Hotel in the central part of the city.

The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) has been working with the Hungarian community and the Yugoslav Jewish Federation to care for the Serbian Jews.

"We've set up kindergarten and school classes for around 50 children," Israel Sela, the JDC's country director for Hungary, said. "Many of them – especially from border cities like Subotica and Novi Sad – already speak Hungarian, so they fit in rather easily.

"Two of these parents are teachers from Serbia, and they are creating a curriculum that will keep these children current at home, as well as translate for them on a daily basis." Jewish youth in Budapest who speak Serbo-Croatian are volunteering to take families for shopping and visits to doctors.

B'nai B'rith International is providing fresh fruit every day, along with city transport and telephone cards.

British Jewish organizations such as World Jewish Relief and Connections have also made substantial contributions, much of it earmarked for health insurance and health care. The European Council of Jewish Communities is also helping, and the European Jewish Congress transferred $20,000 to the Hungarian community to help.

While the younger children are settling into their temporary living arrangements, the college-age youth are having a more difficult time.

"I was three weeks away from my degree in theatre," said Stefi, a Belgrade university student, as she sat softly playing jazz on the piano in the Balint centre.

"Now I'm considering my options. It isn't likely that I'll be going home."

Whether Stefi will go to Israel remains open. The Jewish Agency for Israel has quickly processed between 15 and 20 Jews who have already emigrated to Israel, said Joszi Croitoru, a Jewish Agency representative.

He said 80 young Serbian Jews are taking a complimentary 12-day "pilot trip" to Israel and another 80 have signed up.

Still, many of these university students are anguishing about their choices.

Students like Olga Izrael said, "Don't call us refugees. We are just here visiting." She paused. "And thinking about our future."

While they're thinking, they watch CNN's coverage of NATO's bombing runs. They wring their hands while they lie awake at night and try to come to terms with the fact that for many of them, the lives they led in Serbia are over.

Milica Afar and her sister-in-law, Lydia Afar – they married brothers – sat calmly as their children, David, Sara, Theo and Michael scrambled around them, playing.

"My husband is a biochemist and Milica's is a property manager for a film production company," Lydia said. "But thinking about the future for our children, I think Israel becomes more and more attractive."

A week later, the two women and their families had already left for Israel.

All this began to take place in Budapest during the first days of Passover. In 1992, several of these Jews had opened the Belgrade community centre's seder to Sarajevo's Jews fleeing that war. Now they themselves are on the run, or at least waiting out what history will bring them.

One thing is clear: The post-Holocaust Jewish community of the former Yugoslavia was small and poor, yet these 6,500 Jews created one of the most lively small communities in Europe.

Beginning with the war in Croatia in 1991 and the war in Bosnia in 1992, many of the younger Jews in each of these communities made their way to the United States, Canada, Israel and elsewhere. Sarajevo's Jewish youth will never return.

Now it appears as though Belgrade's Jewish community is beginning to empty out as well.

Community thrived in pre-WWII Belgrade

By EDWARD SEROTTA
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUDAPEST — Before the Holocaust, Serbia served as a European crossroads, and its Jewish population, with a mix of Sephardim and Ashkenazim, reflected this fact.

Belgrade's community swelled to nearly 11,000 in the 1930s – about five percent of them refugees from Germany, Austria and Czechoslovakia.

Serbia's Jews were found in the cities. In a country where 40 percent of the population lived in small villages or on farms, more than 70 percent of the Jews lived in major cities.

Jews gravitated toward the professions in Serbia and made up a large percentage of Belgrade's intellectual elite.

During World War II, Yugoslavia was overrun by the Germans. Croatia became a Nazi puppet state, set up its own concentration camps and killed a great many Jews as well as Serbs.

The vast majority of Serbia's Jews were killed by Germans, even though the Germans found no friends in the Serb government of Gen. Milan Nedic.

After the Holocaust, 15,000 Jews were left in all of Yugoslavia from a pre-war total of 76,000. Many who survived left after the establishment of Marshal Tito's one-party state, leaving some 6,500.

The community was not particularly religious, but after the 1967 Six Day War, many younger Jews reclaimed their Jewish connections and communities.

When Yugoslavia disintegrated in war in the 1990s, the Jewish communities in the successor states remained in contact as best they could.

Serbia's Jewish community had long had a reputation for generosity – having helped German Jews in the 1930s and Sarajevo's Jews in the 1990s – and worked hard to stay out of politics.

The world according to Hershel

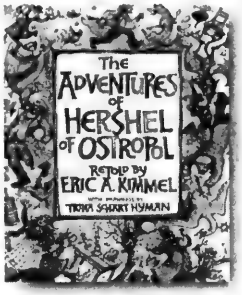
By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

People all over the world tell stories about a person who is very poor, but is also very smart. He manages to get along in the world by tricking other people, playing jokes on them, and inventing all sorts of stories.

Because he is always telling jokes and playing the fool, people often don't realize how intelligent he is, and the lessons people can learn from him.

(I say "him," by the way, because nearly all of these people are men. Maybe the women were too busy looking after their homes and their children to bother with this kind of thing.)

One of the most famous Jewish tricksters is Hershel of Ostropol. He actually was a real person, who lived in Ukraine in the early 1800s. Over the years, so many stories have been told about him, that it sometimes seems as if he must be completely made up.



Eric A. Kimmel tells about Hershel in his book of short stories The Adventures of Hershel of Ostropol, (Holiday House, 1995, with drawings by Trina Schart Hyman.)

Hershel of Ostropol was always planning schemes to support his wife and large family. Once he pretended that his wife had died. The community gave him money for funeral expenses, which he used for food. When the burial society came to bury her, she "miraculously" came back to life.

Another time, he went for help to his rich, but very stingy uncle Zalman. When his uncle refused to help him, he asked to borrow a serving spoon. When Hershel returned it, he also brought a little spoon, explaining that the big spoon had given birth. He did this several times. Finally, he borrowed his uncle's candlesticks, but didn't return them, claiming that they had died. When his uncle protested that candlesticks couldn't die, Hershel demanded to know why not, if spoons could have babies.

My favorite story is about Hershel looking for a place to stay and some food, from a stingy innkeeper and his wife. When he was refused, Hershel threatened to do what his father did. The innkeepers got so scared that they plied him with a whole banquet. When they timidly asked him what his father had done, well – you will have to read the story for yourself.

It is important to remember that Hershel and others like him, didn't take advantage of honest and decent people. Their prey was the person who was arrogant, stingy, bad tempered or overconfident.

At the end of the book is a collection of Hershel's sayings, which illustrate his philosophy of life. While most of them are funny – God must love poor people. Why else would He make so many of them? – they all illustrate universal truths: Better to eat black bread than to dream of challah; it's easy to practice barbering on somebody else's beard.

You might enjoy trying to prove that Hershel's sayings are true or not true, and making up your own philosophical statements.

Business Profile

Entrepreneur a major backer of Israel's Technion

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Peter Munk, one of Canada's most successful entrepreneurs, has come full circle.

Fifty-five years ago, when the Holocaust was devouring the Jews of Hungary, he and his family fled Budapest on the so-called Kasztner train, filled with 1,684 Hungarian Jews who had bought their way to freedom.

"There were payments to the Germans involved," recalled Munk matter of factly.

The Munk family, which had grown wealthy in banking, stock brokerage and investments, secured places on the train by giving up gold in their possession. But the Munks' passage out of war-torn Hungary would not have been possible without the machinations of Rudolf Kasztner, a shadowy fixer and Jewish communal activist who was later accused of collaborating with the Germans.

The train, a Noah's Ark of Hungarian Jewry, steamed out of Budapest on June 30, 1944. It reached the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp – which SS chieftain Heinrich Himmler had transformed into a transit and exchange camp for Jews – on July 8. Eventually, the Munks found refuge in Switzerland.

Five decades on, Munk, an electrical engineer by training but a businessman by instinct, heads up a multi-billion dollar empire whose wealth is generated in part by gold.

Munk, 71, is founder and chair of Barrick Gold Corporartion, the world's second-largest producer, with a market capitalization of $8 billion (US). Barrick, Munk's most professionally satisfying venture, has mines in North and South America. In 1998, the firm produced 3.2 million ounces of gold at a cash-operating cost of $160 (US) per ounce.

Munk, as well, is chair and chief executive officer of TrizecHahn Corporation, North America's second largest public real estate company, with a market capitalization of $3 billion (US). TrizecHahn, which has more than $7 billion (US) in assets, owns and manages a portfolio of 119 properties in Canada and the United States, comprising 65 million square feet. Among its assets are the CN Tower in Toronto, Place Ville Marie in Montreal, the Sears Tower in Chicago and the Grace Building in Manhattan. By a quirk of fate, Munk is also The Canadian Jewish News' landlord.

Peter Newman, the business writer, has enormous respect for Munk. In his recently published book, The Titans, he gushed: "He operates at the very top levels of the international business world with the skill of a champion swordsman, a Zorro who knows precisely when to feint and when to thrust."

Munk, who was inducted into the Canadian Business Hall of Fame in 1997, is generously compensated for his labors. Last year, according to The Globe and Mail, he was the highest paid executive in Canada, with a salary of $38.9 million (US). By all accounts, Munk's personal fortune ranges from $250 million to $400 million, a sum which enables him and his wife Melanie to maintain a house in Toronto's Forest Hill Village, a farm in the Caledon Hills, a summer home on Georgian Bay, a chalet in Klosters, Switzerland, and an apartment in Paris.

But Munk, who has five children, believes that wealth should not only benefit himself and his family, but the community at large.

On May 16, at a Canadian Technion Society dinner in Toronto, he will officially present a major gift to the Technion, Israel's technical university. "My donation will be substantial," he said. "The evening could be the most successful fund-raising dinner in Canadian history."

A member of Beth Tzedec Synagogue, Munk has great respect for the Technion, whose current president, Amos Lapidot, was commander of the Israeli air force from 1982 until 1987.

"The Technion, in my view, is the foremost institute of learning as far as sciences and engineering – the fields in which I am interested – are concerned. Its contribution is very material, since Israel's economic progress has been technology based. The Technion can contribute enormously by upgrading the educational standards of young Israelis in all fields of technology."

Asked whether he has an emotional attachment to Israel, Munk replied, "My commitment is demonstrated by my support of the Technion. This is based on meeting a concrete need – not an emotion."

Arnie Recht, national president of the Canadian Technion Society, explained that Munk's uncle, Nick, one of the original founders of the organization, brought the Technion to his nephew's attention. "He left an indelible mark on Peter regarding the Technion's importance to Israel."

But Nick Munk and his wife Hedy, were also instrumental in bringing him to Canada so that he could pursue his studies at the University of Toronto.

Peter Munk, who has no business interests in Israel, was born on Nov. 8, 1927, the only child of Louis and Katharine. (His half-brother, Paul, is a Toronto physician).

When Munk was 11 years old, the Hungarian government passed the first of what would be a slew of anti-Semitic edicts. "I was not touched by the official anti-Semitism," he said.

With the German invasion of Hungary in March 1944, the situation deteriorated rapidly. Within weeks, the Nazis, assisted by Hungarian collaborators, began deporting Jews to death camps in Poland.

The Munks, who never had contact with Raoul Wallenberg, the Swedish diplomat who saved upwards of 100,000 Hungarian Jews, were extremely fortunate to obtain tickets for the Kasztner train. Apart from Munk and his parents, several of his relatives, including his grandparents, uncles and aunts, boarded the train.

Munk spent the duration of World War II in Zurich, a neutral capital, and arrived to Toronto in 1948, after the Polytechnical University rejected his application for admission. Supporting himself by picking tobacco in southwestern Ontario and selling Christmas trees, he graduated from the University in Toronto in 1952.

Bored by jobs with Canadian National Telegraphs and Atlas Radio, Munk struck out on his own. He and a friend, David Gilmour, started a number of businesses. In 1958, with borrowed funds, they formed Clairtone Sound Corporation, North America's first manufacturer of top-quality, solid-state radio/record player consoles.

Initially, Clairtone achieved considerable success. But an ill-timed venture into color televisions caused the company to falter. Unbowed, he and Gilmour went on to establish Southern Pacific Hotel Corporation, a huge hotel and resort chain in Australasia, which they ultimately sold for $130 million in 1981.

During this period, Munk tried but failed to build a resort in Cairo, near the pyramids. For apparently political reasons, Anwar Sadat, the president of Egypt, cancelled the project. Years later, Munk won a hefty settlement from the Egyptian government for out-of-pocket expenses. "Negotiating with the Arabs is an art that tests western values to their outer limits," Munk told his biographer, Donald Rumball.

Currently, Munk has no business interests in the Arab world. Nor is he "sour" on Egypt.

Munk, the recipient of the Order of Canada, formed Barrick in 1983, hitting the "motherlode" in 1987 when it acquired the Goldstrike mine in Nevada, a property most experts believed to be limited in potential. Today, Goldstrike ranks as one of the biggest producing, lowest cost gold properties in the world.

Folk choir to perform beloved melodies by Varshovsky

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

M.M. (Mark) Varshovsky

TORONTO — M.M. (Mark) Varshovsky, who wrote and sang Oifn Pripechik, never lived to know how famous he and his songs would become.

He died destitute in 1907, leaving a widow and daughter. But the folk songs he wrote in Yiddish became known the world over. One of his dreams was that he and his writer friend Shalom Aleichem would perform together in North America, but Varshovsky's death intervened.

Fifteen of his songs, including Der Becher, Di Mezinke Oisgegebn and Dem Milner's Trern, will be heard at the annual Toronto Jewish Folk Choir concert May 16 at Walter Hall, University of Toronto.

The choir is combining with the Chutzpah! klezmer band to perform Der Bobes Cholem, a selection of Varshovsky's beloved melodies arranged by Chutzpah! leader, clarinetist Martin Van de Ven.

The concert is a tribute to the Yiddish folksinger whose work became known throughout the Pale of Settlement.

Though they both lived in Kiev, Shalom Aleichem and Varshovsky did not meet until, by chance, the writer heard about the singer on a train trip.

Shalom Aleichem was so impressed by Varshovsky's performance when they finally did meet, that the writer leaped from his seat to kiss the singer.

These and other details are in an introduction that Shalom Aleichem wrote for the second edition of Varshovsky's songs, published by the singer's friends.

The writer described the singer-composer as a near-sighted, rosy-cheeked short man so poor that his clothes were full of holes.

The two men did team up for a few joint recitals, but they never made it to North America.

A lawyer by profession, Varshovsky nearly starved because he refused cases that did not meet his ethical standards. He finally gained a good legal post for an iron company, but shortly thereafter, he became ill and died.

Featured soloists in Der Bobes Cholem are soprano Miriam Eskin, tenor Benjamin Stein and baritone Marat Maxutov.

Under the direction of Yiddish music specialist Esther Ghan Firestone, and with pianist Lina Zemelman, the 35-voice choir also perform a group of Yiddish workers' songs from the sweatshop era, arranged by Zalmen Mlotek. They will also do two excerpts from Toronto composer Srul Irving Glick's First Yiddish Suite, set to poems by Peretz Miransky and I.I. Segal.

Milton Barnes' Sefarad is set to 500 year-old Judeo-Spanish texts. Miriam's Song of Triumph by Schubert showcases soprano Renee Bouthot as guest soloist in this choral work about the biblical exodus.

Tickets are $16, $13 for students and seniors. For information call 489-7681.

SALINGER LOVE LETTERS GO ON AUCTION BLOCK

Remember Joyce Maynard? She's the California-based author of At Home in the World, an autobiography published last year, which made headlines because of its description of a May-October affair between Maynard and reclusive American writer J.D. Salinger. (Their respective ages at the time were 18 and 53.)

Maynard, now 44, is the sister of Rona Maynard, editor of the Canadian women's magazine, Chatelaine. Their father was Max Maynard, a landscape artist from British Columbia. The late writer-broadcaster Fredelle Maynard, who wrote Raisins and Almonds, a memoir about growing up Jewish on the Prairies, was their mother.

Having milked the publicity value from a series of letters that Salinger sent her, Maynard now goes one step further by offering them for public sale through Sotheby's auction house in New York. Viewing dates of the 14 letters are June 17 to 21.

"The 37 pages of Salinger's letters to Joyce constitute the most complete picture of the famous author's life during this period," according to a Sotheby's promotional release. "By turns tender and paternal, the letters document his growing attachment to Joyce, detailing his sense of her unique gifts as a writer, (and) his sense that they are soul mates ....

"Throughout, the reclusive Salinger registers his concerns with the necessity of guarding and protecting the writer's source of creativity from the invasive glare of the outside world."

How ironic that these very letters may now be the agent that helps to bring the invasive glare of publicity upon the New Hampshire-based Salinger, who is so wary of media attention that he is reportedly delaying publication of numerous completed works of fiction until after his death.

Maynard, meanwhile, is not the least bit publicity-shy, as evidenced by her personal web site at www.joycemaynard.com/home/html

founded some years earlier, is in an expansionist mode.

It is building Hollywood and Highland, a $430 million retail/entertainment complex in Los Angeles which will host the Oscars; Desert Passage at Aladdin, part of a $1.3 billion hotel/casino/retail and entertainment redevelopment in Las Vegas; and the 50-storey Bankers Hall West Tower in Calgary.

In Europe, where Munk has lately spent a good deal of his time, he is constructing a 900,000 square foot office, hotel and conference complex in Budapest.

He professes to have no bitter feelings about Hungary. As he put it: "Hungary is no different than any other country either occupied or allied with Germany during World War II, and there is nothing to forgive, since today's generation had nothing to do with what happened there in 1944 and before."

Asked whether he has drawn any lessons from the Holocaust, he said, "We must always be vigilant."

Munk, too, is building supermarkets in the Czech Republic, retail/entertainment facilities in Spain, pursuing projects in Italy, Poland and Slovakia, and assessing opportunities in Romania and Turkey.

Munk, who is said to be undaunted by the size and scope of any project, claims that the secret of his success lies in a few maxims he has adhered to assiduously.

"Ensure you have a clear, focused strategy. Be innovative, and challenge accepted thinking. Recruit excellent partners and align your interests with shareholders. Take advantage of the forces of change and build on opportunities. Be conservatively financed."

According to his biographer, Munk's "golden rules" encompass the following principles:

• Raise money when financial markets are buoyant. Invest it when markets are depressed.

• Work with people whom you respect and who have characteristics you don't have.

• If an acquisition is strategically right, don't worry about price.

• Don't stop dreaming.

• Trust is the foundation. Trust means you can say the truth.

• You don't need to know the industry you're going into. If you apply yourself, you can always find the experts.

Surprisingly enough, Munk is not a workaholic, and always allots sufficient leisure time for sailing, tennis and skiing.

None of his children, Cheyne, Natalie, Anthony, Nina and Marc David, presently work for him. But Anthony sits on Barrick's board of directors.

Despite his age, he has no intention of retiring. "Not as long as I can contribute to creating shareholders' wealth effectively," he said, consigning the issue to oblivion.

Historic Cairo synagogue still serves small community

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

CAIRO, Egypt — A renovated synagogue in old Cairo, shaded by six mature trees, is one of the fruits of Israel's 20-year-old peace treaty with Egypt.

Once woefully dilapidated, the Ben Ezra Synagogue – one of the oldest in Egypt and the repository of the famous Cairo Geniza – was restored to its former grandeur under the direction of Phyllis Lambert, a Montreal architect and conservationist.

Set in a quiet courtyard close to the Church of St. Barbara, in a shabby Coptic Christian neighborhood frequented by insistent hawkers selling cheap Egyptian souvenirs, the shul was in dismal condition when the Ben Ezra Synagogue Restoration Project got underway in January 1988.

Anwar Sadat, the late president of Egypt, conceived the project as an adjunct of Egypt's peace accord with Israel, signed in Washington on March 26, 1979.

In 1980, Lambert – founder and director of Montreal's Canadian Centre for Architecture – was appointed director of the Ben Ezra Synagogue Restoration Project, a unique undertaking in the Arab world.

By 1987, an international team of architects, conservationists, archeologists, surveyors and historians had been assembled.

It consisted of, among others, Johan Bellaert, a Belgian architect who had been employed by Oman's ministry of national heritage and culture; John Stewart, a University of Chicago conservator who had worked on temples in Luxor; and Joseph Hacker, a Hebrew University historian familiar with the medieval and modern history of the synagogue.

They finished their work in August 1991, a year after the crisis over Iraq's invasion of Kuwait flared. Through a spokesperson, Lambert, the editor of a book about the project entitled Fortifications and the Synagogue, said that she was exceedingly pleased with the results of the renovation.

By all accounts, the original synagogue – named in honor of a 12th century Jerusalem rabbi, Abraham Ben Ezra – was built more than 1,000 years ago, supposedly on the site of a church.

Rebuilt in 1892, following the collapse of its roof, the shul became a centre of Jewish communal life in Cairo.

In the late 19th century, when Egypt was a British protectorate, the centuries-old Jewish community was still growing, drawing new blood from the Middle East and Europe. On the eve of the 1948 Arab-Israeli war, Egypt was home to about 75,000 Jews, the majority of whom resided in Cairo.

It was a prosperous, sophisticated community, and Jews played a prominent role in commerce, banking, culture and politics.

From the mid-1860s, an extraordinary body of discarded writings, universally known as the Cairo Geniza, turned up. The documents offered fresh, startling insights into the daily life of the Jewish community from the 10th to the 14th centuries and its interaction with other Mediterranean communities.

According to Lambert, the inspiration to search for ancient documents in the synagogue may have come from an 18th century scholar named Simon van Geldern, who recalled having rummaged for "Hebrew books and writings which had become unusable."

In his wake, arrived many more collectors and scholars, most of whom represented British, American and Russian centres of learning. Notable among them were Abraham Firkovitch and Solomon Schechter.

It is estimated that upwards of 200,000 fragments of vellum, parchment and paper were removed from Ben Ezra's storeroom. No expense was spared to buy them.

Today, the majority of these precious documents are found in collections at Cambridge University Library, the Jewish Theological Seminary in Manhattan, the Saltykov-Schedrin Library in St. Petersburg, Oxford's Bodleian Library, the British Library and the Alliance Israelite Universelle in Paris.

Generations of scholars have pored over the documents, but the definitive study based on the Cairo Geniza was produced by an Israeli, Shlomo Dov Goitein, author of A Mediterranean Society, a five-volume tour de force of medieval Jewry.

Surprisingly enough, fragments from the Cairo Geniza are not on display at the Ben Ezra Synagogue's Library of the Jewish Heritage in Egypt. It was inaugurated by President Hosni Mubarak on Nov. 25, 1997, exactly a week after Islamic terrorists shot and killed 58 foreign tourists in Luxor.

The synagogue itself, surrounded by high walls and adjacent to a Christian cemetery sprouting crosses, is modest in size yet esthetically impressive.

The floor is made of white, black-flecked marble, and 10 stately white columns on each side rise to the ceiling. On the wooden walls are intricate carvings studded with ivory. Above the roped-off bimah are two stained glass windows.

Worshippers sit on benches running vertically along the length of the building. The second-storey gallery is currently closed due to renovations.

This is a functioning synagogue, but the last rabbi left long ago. According to Lonely Planet's guidebook, Egypt (Raincoast), approximately 40 Jewish families live near the shul. The Jewish community's administrative building lies near the synagogue.

Throughout Egypt, there are no more than several hundred Jews. Waves of emigration since 1948, sparked by political and economic uncertainty and Muslim suspicion of Jews, have reduced the community to a virtual hollow shell.

During the 1967 Six Day War, when Egypt went down to ignominious defeat at the hands of Israel, the synagogue was attacked by mobs and badly damaged, touching off yet another exodus of Jews.

A tourist attraction for years now, the synagogue is looked after by two plain clothes attendants, a Muslim and a Copt. They guard it zealously, acutely aware that foreigners in Egypt have fallen prey to homegrown terrorism since 1992.

Its former caretaker, Natan Abraham Moses, whom I met during my first visit to the synagogue in 1975, died some years ago. It was he who showed me the mikvah, the supposed spring where a pharaoh's daughter found Moses in a maze of reeds.

It seems clear that the synagogue is in need of funds. A sign in English at the entrance reads: "Your contribution will help towards the maintenance and upkeep of this synagogue. Give generously."

Marketing rules entertainment business

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

The video market in North America offers a fascinating insight into the way marketing rules the entertainment business.

In the ordinary course of events, a film is released in a blaze of publicity into hundreds of theatres on the same day. The film has its run, earns its money and about six months later, it appears in thousands of video stores throughout the continent.

Initially most videos are released with the intention that they will be rented by the public. Therefore, they are sold to the stores at a relatively prohibitive price for the every-day consumer – usually in excess of $100.

But about six months after that initial video release, when rentals have begun to flag, the video is re-released at a sell-through price of about $20 to $30. It then becomes completely accessible to the millions of film fans and video collectors throughout North America.

At various times during the ensuing years, the video is re-released several more times, with prices usually being reduced until it can be purchased for $10 to $20.

There are exceptions to these rules, but having observed the video market for some 20 years now, I believe the script is fairly predictable.

In my previous articles, I have written mainly about new releases and titles that may be relatively obscure. Today I want to address a number of re-releases that have made a lot of titles easily available at a price that makes them affordable to most of us.

Since the year 1999 began, the video companies have been re-releasing a large number of titles. If these are not available at your favorite store, the manager or owner should be able to order them from his distributor.

Driving Miss Daisy

Alliance Home Video has re-released such titles of "Jewish" interest as The Music Box, the story of an elderly Hungarian immigrant (Armin Mueller-Stahl) to the United States who is accused of being a war criminal, and his lawyer-daughter (Jessica Lange) who undertakes to defend him.

Also recently reduced in price by Alliance are The Nasty Girl, a true story centring around a German woman who tries to learn the truth about what her town did during the war; Shine, the story of a Jewish Australian piano prodigy; and Deconstructing Harry, Woody Allen's film of self-exploration and discovery.

Warner Home Video has joined the re-release craze with Driving Miss Daisy, the story of a Jewish southern lady and her black chauffeur; the brilliant Bob Fosse production of Cabaret; and the heart warming tale of love in Crossing Delancey.

Other recent re-releases include Jonah Who Lived In The Whale, the tender story of a child surviving the concentration camps during the Holocaust; Woody Allen's classic, Annie Hall; the humorous Cemetery Club; and the controversial A Price Above Rubies.

For a real tear jerker, Columbia Tristar just released the 25th anniversary edition of The Way We Were, and Behavior has re-released a fascinating film about the Mossad, Les Patriotes.

In addition, MGM is re-releasing the 1975 comedy, The Sunshine Boys, starring Walter Matthau and George Burns, and Artisan is releasing the 1995 television version of the same film, but starring Woody Allen and Peter Falk.

So for those who are anxious to obtain their favorite films, the thing to be remembered is that most videos will be reduced in price, given enough time and patience.

For those interested in what to look for in the weeks and months to come, we can expect Life Is Beautiful and Prince of Egypt to arrive on video in the near future, with The Harmonists, The Last Days and A Walk On The Moon to follow shortly, although at the time of writing no release dates had been announced as yet.

'Sheer luck' saved survivor

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sheer luck is what brought writer Jack Kuper through the Holocaust, he recently told the Medina Theatre Ensemble.

Along with writer/playwrights Howard Engel and Judith Thompson, Kuper took part in an open discussion with members of the Jewish theatre group.

Author of A Child of the Holocaust and director of documentaries about life in the Warsaw Ghetto, Kuper said he now understands why people can go about their normal duties despite the horrors going on in Kosovo.

"It is amazing what the human being can do," he said. "When I first came to Halifax at the age of 15, a Jewish volunteer gave me a copy of the magazine Life. Everybody in it seemed happy. Didn't they know what had happened?"

When he came to Toronto, Kuper said, he was amazed to find that people were complaining in letters to the editor about barking dogs.

"I am much less critical today of people who go about their mundane duties while terrible things are happening."

A lot of the questioners asked Kuper how he had survived, when, as a boy of nine, he had to cope alone after most of his family was wiped out.

"A lot of it had to do with sheer luck," he said. "I could have turned left or right, but I made the right turn. I had a sort of sixth sense. I'm often asked by psychiatrists how I did it. I didn't ask for help. Instead, I asked if I could do any work for them, even changing diapers. I owe a lot to my father, who spent many years in Siberia, because I had many of his characteristics."

Kuper said he does not help people who beg on the streets in Toronto. "If they asked for work, I would do everything I could to help them."

Engel read Three Wise Guys, a short story in which a friend of Engel's private investigator character, Benny Cooperman, says: "You Jews don't celebrate Christmas, you just start'd it."

He said his 10th novel, titled Benny Cooperma.' in Toronto will be out this year.

Though he doesn't do any detective work himself, Engel said he once played detective in Ottawa to tell the National Gallery where to find a valuable missing painting he had seen in an Ottawa house.

Playwright Thompson, winner of many national awards, read three powerful excerpts from her plays, in each case speaking on behalf of people whose voices are usually silent. In one, a 10-year-old white girl, grieving at the coffin of the family's black domestic servant, pleads for forgiveness for the injustices of apartheid in South Africa.

Trudi Deacon, Medina president, was moderator, while the writers were introduced by Fran Elliot and thanked by Roselle Stone.

Fundraising for book

Sharon, Pope hold talks

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — Israeli Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon has met with Pope John Paul II and other top church officials for more than two hours, on what Vatican insiders termed "cordial but difficult" talks on issues largely relating to the millennium.

However, no agreement from the meeting emerged on a papal trip to the Holy Land, a potentially explosive dispute over plans to build a mosque in Nazareth or other Middle East issues, including the status of Jerusalem.

"I want to be very clear, and I said this today" at the meeting, Sharon told a news conference. "Jerusalem has been the capital of the Jewish people for 3,000 years and the capital of the state of Israel for 51. It will never be divided. It will always be the only and indivisible capital of Israel."

In the past, the Vatican has suggested that Jerusalem become either an internationally mandated holy city or the capital of both Israel and an eventual Palestinian state. Vatican officials have called the Israeli occupation of eastern Jerusalem "illegal."

Sharon had a 30-minute private audience with the Pope followed by what the Vatican called a more-than-90-minute "working meeting" with Vatican Secretary of State Cardinal Angelo Sodano and other senior Vatican officials.

A Vatican statement said talks centred on "the tormented peace process in the Middle East, on the conditions of the presence and activity of the Catholic church in the country, as well as on the necessary co-operation in view of the celebration" of the millennium.

Sharon renewed Israel's long-standing invitation for the Pope to visit the Holy Land, saying he hoped he would realize his dream of visiting sites during the millennium year.

"He wants to come, and we want him to come," he said. "We hope it happens. We want him to be the first pilgrim, first in every way."

He also guaranteed safety and freedom of movement for Christians pilgrims to all Holy Land sites under Israeli jurisdiction.

The tense situation in Nazareth, he said, was high on the agenda. "I came to hear the position of the Catholic Church," he said. "I am convinced that a solution will be found. We have discussed the issue."

Nazareth, revered by Christians as the boyhood home of Jesus, is Israel's largest Arab city.

Ariel Sharon

Muslims want to build a large mosque in Nazareth, near the Church of the Annunciation, the site where Christians believe the angel Gabriel announced to Mary that she would give birth.

Christians oppose this plan, and with the Vatican's backing, Christian churches in the region have threatened to close their doors if Israel approves construction of the mosque.

Violent clashes broke out over the affair during Easter. The dispute is threatening to disrupt millennium celebrations there.

Police consider charges

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israeli police have recommended that Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon and a business associate be charged with alleged bribery, fraud, breach of trust and obstruction of justice, Israeli media reported last week.

Sharon, who denied the allegations against him, called on the state attorney to decide before the May 17 elections whether to indict him.

Sharon's lawyer, Ya'acov Weinrot, said that from his discussions with the state attorney, Edna Arbel, it did not appear that the recommendation for charges to be filed was unequivocal.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who submitted testimony to police as part of the inquiry, said he had full confidence in Sharon and in his innocence, Israel Television reported.

The police probe was launched last summer at the request of the Israeli daily newspaper Ha'aretz. The paper claimed that Sharon had bribed a witness in an unsuccessful libel suit the minister had brought against Ha'aretz over an article it published regarding Sharon's role in the 1982 Lebanon War.

Sharon had included the business associate, Avigdor Ben Gal, in a delegation he led as minister of infrastructure to Russia in June 1997.

According to the allegations, Sharon promised to include Ben Gal in a lucrative natural gas deal under consideration in exchange for his altering his testimony.

Ben Gal was called as a witness because he is a retired general who was a senior commander during the war.

Two weeks after returning from Russia, Ben Gal testified in court.

His testimony contradicted remarks which he had made in a university lecture a decade earlier, that Sharon, as defence minister in 1982, had concealed from then-prime minister Menachem Begin plans he had for a far-reaching military operation into Lebanon. Ben Gal also did not disclose that his last contact with Sharon had been during the business trip to Russia.

Israel Radio, citing sources close to the police investigation, reported that the probe had uncovered evidence substantiating some of the allegations.

Arbel said that it was possible no decision would be made until after the May 17 elections.

Competes against athletes twice his age

Talented teenager a natural at wheelchair tennis

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — From the moment Frank Peter saw Joel Dembe on the tennis court, he knew he was watching someone special.

The youngster was a natural when it came to wheelchair tennis.

"I saw incredible hand-eye coordination, and his chair movement was just great," Peter said.

For his part, Dembe loved his first try at the sport. "I hit it off right away," he said. "I was okay at the start and then I got better."

It was a match made in heaven – or at least at the Stoney Creek Tennis Club – for the up-and-coming 15-year-old tennis player and the 32-year-old coach. Since that auspicious day two years ago, Dembe has improved considerably, testing himself against players twice his age and five times his experience – and more than holding his own.

At the Windsor Indoor Games last March, he finished second in the second-tier "A Division" after posting a 2-1 record. "At his age, he was great," said Peter, who's ranked number 6 in Canada. "In two matches I watched, he beat guys with five to six years of experience."

Last December, at a tournament in Montreal, Dembe teamed up with Norman Jean Preire to take the A Division doubles championship. In singles, he lost a hard-fought match to a 30-year-old player in three sets on a tie-breaker (8-5). "It was a really good game," he says. "I just got tired at the end. It was a three-hour game."

In Ottawa last July, Dembe finished second in the junior (18 and under) division, while a month before at the Ontario Open, he lost two games, to a 34- and a 30-year-old player.

"Every tournament I've played in, I've been the youngest. The next youngest player was 18, and I beat him," Dembe said.

Because there are just a handful of wheelchair players of his age in Canada, Dembe must practice against athletes much older than himself, but the skills and the intangibles that make for good athletes keep him competitive, Peter said.

"His determination, his will and his talent give him the right stuff," he said.

Peter believes Dembe has tremendous potential in the world of competitive wheelchair tennis. "He could be in the top five in Canada within eight years, perhaps even the top player," said Peter, who is a contender for the Canadian Paralympics team.

That would suit Dembe just fine.

Joel Dembe

"Right now my goal is to be number 1 in Ontario, but my coach would have to retire for that to happen. He can smoke my socks right now."

Unlike other kids his own age, Dembe has the right temperament to succeed at the sport. Other teens get frustrated and lose their cool when things don't go well. Not Dembe.

"His attitude is really good," said Peter, who trains with Dembe once a week. "If he misses a shot, he wants to get back out there again until he gets it right."

For his part, Dembe displays the kind of mental rigor that most top athletes possess: "I've learned to focus more and to concentrate. If I lose a point, I stay calm and don't think about what I missed, but about the shot I'm going to make next," he said.

His mother Cheryl, loves what the sport has given her son – and the family. "Our whole family plays tennis now because of Joel," she said.

"It's been great for him and it's given him confidence. It's opened up the world to him."

From his home in Orkney, Ont., a small, rural community outside Hamilton, Dembe has travelled across the province to play tennis, and he's met other wheelchair athletes from across the country. He's planning to travel to Pittsburgh later this summer to test himself in a tournament against American players in his age group.

Prior to his interest in tennis, Dembe played sledge hockey, baseball and he remains an avid golfer. Having tried team and individual sports, he's found he prefers individual sports. Golf is similar to tennis in that both require good hand-eye coordination and every success you achieve is personal, he said.

"I like how golf is your game. The only person who can control the game is you. It's such a mental game," he said.

Although he plays tennis in a wheelchair, Dembe can get around with the aid of crutches. For golf, his father Steven, drives him to the ball in a golf cart. Using a single crutch, Dembe positions himself over the ball. He then drops the crutch, gets balanced and takes a swing with a special, shortened club. He's able to drive the ball 100 yards, "but my putting is better," he said.

Dembe was born with teratoma, a benign tumor in the abdomen that migrated to the spine, compressing it and causing nerve damage. He's a partial paraplegic but an ultra-light, highly maneuverable, three-wheeled wheelchair makes him mobile for tennis.

AEROBICS IN SPANDEX

The Bathurst Jewish Centre was the scene of a recent CHAT Aerobithon in which 75 high school students jumped, pumped, sweated and strained in support of the Canadian Cancer Association. The students raised more than $4,000 to go to the Association's Joan Blidner Memorial Fund. The fund was established by the school in memory of a staff member who died of cancer last year.

The Inside Back

When we really count...

Last Laugh

At this time of year, it seems no matter which way you turn, you just can't seem to avoid some type of counting, whether it was the income tax filing deadline, the start of baseball season, the approaching end of the school year, or even the next hockey season (particularly true for teams which don't even make the playoffs).

Whether you consider these things as positive or negative, really depends on which side of the issue you're on. For example, on the income tax issue, if you're a tax auditor, I suppose you look forward with breathless anticipation to the big day in April. On the other hand, if you're a taxpayer, the opposite feeling probably holds true. So are all these countings at this time of year mere coincidence?

I firmly believe that one day, geneticists will discover the Sfirah gene, named for the mitzvah of Sfirah, the 49-day counting of the Omer, done from Pesach through to Shavuot. In doing the counting, we make an annual effort to mark our movement away from Mitzrayim (as represented gastronomically by matzah and macaroons), and spiritually upward towards receiving the Torah at Mount Sinai (as represented by blintzes and chocolate cheesecake).

Now, for most people, thinking about the next chag at this point in time ranks right up there with nostalgically remembering one's last root canal. Aren't we all just a little bit "chagged out", secretly relieved that another year's Pesach cleaning, cooking, late night seders, matzah consumption and box shlepping are behind us? Surely only obsessive-compulsive types and masochists would be looking forward to the next chag's cooking and other preparations, not to mention the lost sleep during the Shavuot all-nighter learnathon.

Around our house, while awaiting Shavuot, we concurrently experience the annual great birthday party countdown. Our oldest son, who was born during Pesach, has his party sometime after Pesach, when his parents have (somewhat) recovered their sanity.

This year, we initially thought of having his party during Chol hamo'ed, but reconsidered after he informed us that if we served a matzah pizza he would personally boycott his party, stage a protest and invite the national media. We backed down, and so his party was held two Sundays after Pesach.

Our second son, who was born just before Shavuot, usually doesn't have to wait quite as long for his party after his actual birth date. Our daughter, born the day before Yom Kippur, is virtually guaranteed not to have her party until at least chol hamo'ed Sukkot, and usually after Simchat Torah.

Either way, there is much anticipation of these three annual events. Of course, it's real easy for the kids; all they have to really do is count. They don't have to drive themselves a little meshuge with all the preparations. They don't have to worry about trying to come up with yet another idea that jaded classmates haven't done yet.

Yet, they want to micro-manage the whole affair, from who's invited (or definitely, positively not invited) to exactly what goes on the birthday cake, to who sits beside who, to what goes in the loot bags. However, they don't lose sleep planning for rainy day activities for easily bored party guests. They just show up.

Nonetheless, they do have to count to the big day. Boy, do they count. The chant of "How many days til my birthday?" is uttered several times a day, from sunrise (and earlier) until bedtime. I never knew my kids could count quite so high (up to 250 days).

So, I think we can learn a lesson from our kids about the importance of counting the Omer, especially when it's something of value we're looking forward to. It's largely a matter of perspective. On Shavuot, we are supposed to renew our dedication to receiving the Torah, our road map to life. Oh, yes, let's not forget about the massive consumption of blintzes and cheesecake. So, to all those eagerly (and perhaps not so eagerly) waiting for Shavuot, relax and enjoy. Hey, it's only a two-day yom tov.

ROASTED GARLIC TOMATO BISQUE

1 large onion, peeled, quartered
8 medium plum tomatoes, cored
1 bulb elephant garlic, roasted, mashed
1 can (28 oz) undrained plum tomatoes, chopped
6 fresh basil leaves, thinly sliced olive oil
2 tblsp. brown sugar
1/2 cup broth
salt
pepper

Preheat broiler or bbq. Brush onion lightly with oil & grill until golden & slightly blackened on edges, remove and set aside. Grill tomatoes until skin blisters. Remove from heat, peel off skin. In med. saucepan, heat 1 tblsp. olive oil over med. heat. Add charred onion, tomatoes & roasted garlic cloves removed from bulb. (To roast garlic, trim top, brush with oil & bake 45-60 mins. @ 350°F.) Cook tomato mixture 2-3 mins. Add brown sugar, being careful not to scorch as it caramelizes. Stir & scrape bottom & sides of pan, then add canned tomatoes & broth. Stir occasionally, allowing soup to simmer on med.-low heat. Reduce by half. Using blender, purée hot soup, season with salt & pepper. Pour into bowl & garnish with basil. Makes 4 cups.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

I always thought that I was reasonably popular with the other girls in my grade. I'm in Grade 6, and there seem to be more parties this year than ever before. I am usually invited to all the parties except for one girl's party. She never invites me. I went to ask her why she wouldn't invite me and she said she didn't have enough room, but I know that she is lying. I know she has the right to invite whoever she wants, but it makes me feel very sad and left out. What do you think I should do?

Popular Paranoia

Dear Popular Paranoia,

Grade 6 is the beginning of your senior elementary years of school. During this period, socially, things begin to change and develop differently. When a situation similar to yours arises, it is important to remember that you must never doubt yourself and your social skills and standings. Simply because you were not invited to one party, does not mean you are, or will be, looked upon differently by your peers. You must feel secure about your social status and not worry about how others view you.

As for the specific issues concerning your classmate who did not invite you to her party, do not jump to conclusions and immediately assume the worst. You must try to believe the girl when she said that she could not invite you, and trust what she said to you.

Furthermore, you have many parties to look forward to. Everyone, at some point, will feel similar to the way you feel. People go to different parties at different times, usually based on personal preferences. Just as no one looks at them differently, no one will look at or judge you differently.

Another factor that you must keep in mind is the close unit of friends which you have already established. These friends are the most important, and can be counted on. The most enjoyable parties that you will attend will most likely be theirs, for they are who matter.

Remember, being invited to one party is not what is important or what determines popularity. Be confident with yourself and feel comfortable with those around you. That is true importance.

Karilani is a composite name for three girls, who are close friends and in Grade 11 in Toronto.

Flashpoint in Jerusalem

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — As the controversy over the closure of three Palestinian offices in the Orient House threatened to lurch out of control, U.S. peace envoy Dennis Ross phoned Public Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani on the weekend to try and defuse tensions.

According to a senior U.S. official, "the gaps are bridgeable." The official expressed the hope that the Israeli government would provide more time for the negotiations to continue.

"The gaps are more about form than about substance," the official said.

The U.S. official noted that the Palestinians believe that Kahalani is personally negotiating in good faith. The United States believes that both sides want the issue to be resolved peacefully, the official said.

The problem is that the Palestinians do not want to be seen as pawns in the hands of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, whom they think is determined to provoke an eve-of-elections crisis. However, the Palestinians are also under countervailing pressure from their own constituency not to be seen as buckling under to Israeli pressure.

'VOYAGE OF THE DAMNED' REMEMBERED

Sixty years ago on May 13, the St. Louis set sail from Hamburg on its way to Cuba. Its passengers, however, two of whom are seen here peering longingly from a porthole on the ship, were turned away and forced to return to Europe. In this issue of The CJN we recall that 'voyage of the damned'. Please see page 9. [U.S. Holocaust Museum photo]

'Holocaust imaging disturbing'

IRWIN COTLER

By IRWIN COTLER
Special to The CJN

One of the more disturbing and misleading aspects of the Kosovo tragedy, is the invocation of Holocaust imaging – replete with manipulative symbolism, false equivalencies, and failed memory – by protagonists and perpetrators, victims and bystanders, commentators and critics.

For NATO, the post-Holocaust cry of "never again" is invoked to justify the use of sustained bombing to "prevent another Holocaust" in Kosovo. Yet, this manipulative symbolism belies the numerous non-interventions by the international community in the post-Holocaust "yet agains" in Cambodia, Iraq, Bosnia, and Rwanda, not to mention the near decade-long silence of NATO over Kosovo.

Slobodan Milosevic is demonized as a "Hitler" by NATO leaders, to justify bombing him, a metaphor for radical evil. But these same leaders are still prepared "to do business with him" while avoiding his indictment as a war criminal, then or now. The appeasement of Hitler in Munich is invoked; the appeasement of Milosovic in Bosnia and Kosovo is ignored.

Milosevic himself, plays and replays on Serbian state-controlled television, images of Nazi bombing of Belgrade during World War II. In this manipulative false equivalence, NATO becomes the "Nazis", President Clinton is "Bill Hitler", and the Serbs are the "victims" of these "neo-Nazis."

The News in Brief

CANADA

CJC Meets Manning

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) president Moshe Ronen led a recent delegation to meet with Reform party leader Preston Manning. Issues discussed included the crisis in Kosovo; international terrorism and Canadian security; immigration and refugee policy; Nazi war criminals in Canada; hate on the Internet; and the bond between Israel and Canada. Also on the agenda was the establishment of a Holocaust museum in Ottawa.

School Gets Green Light

VANCOUVER — A new Jewish high school has been approved for this September. The community has raised about 80 percent of the funds needed, but still needs $1 million to meet the projected capital budget. The first year of the school will be held at the current Maimonides school site. Plans call for a new building in September 2000.

Observers In Balkans

TORONTO — Leo Goldhar, past campaign chair of UJA Federation, is Canada's representative among a group of North American UJA leaders currently on a fact-finding trip to the Balkans. The mission will allow communal leaders to witness relief efforts, visit refugee camps and meet Jews from Belgrade now living in Budapest. The trip will conclude with visits to Muslim and Jewish refugees now in Israel.

Grossman Named To Bench

TORONTO — Jack Grossman, immediate past president of Beth Tzedec Congregation, has been appointed to the Ontario Court of Justice (formerly the Ontario Court, Provincial Division). Grossman has been a lawyer for the past 27 years, with emphasis in criminal law.

ISRAEL

Soldiers Killed, Wounded

JERUSALEM — An Israeli soldier was killed and another was wounded earlier this month in the southern Lebanon security zone by a roadside bomb planted by Hezbollah gunmen. Nine Israeli soldiers have been killed in the region this year. On the same day, Hezbollah gunmen wounded three soldiers, one of them seriously, during an attack on an Israeli army base in southern Lebanon.

Landmine Conference

JERUSALEM — Israeli representatives are expected to participate in an upcoming international conference on the banning of anti-personnel mines, despite Israel's refusal to sign a treaty on the matter. The conference, which will take place in Mozambique next month, will attempt to expedite implementation of the Canadian-led landmine agreement and provide aid to countries seeking to dismantle the mines. Some 135 countries have signed the treaty, which took effect in March.

WORLD

Neo-Nazis March

HAMBURG — About 350 neo-Nazis recently marched through the centre of a small German town near here. Demonstrators reportedly arrived in Ahrensburg in five buses and carried Nazi flags and banners attacking foreigners.

General's Jewish Roots

NEW YORK — The American general leading the NATO military operation against Yugoslavia discovered his Jewish roots as an adult, the New York Times reported. Gen. Wesley Kanne Clark, who was raised a Protestant in Little Rock, Ark., embraced his background when he learned of it in his 20s, according to several family members. His grandfather, Jacob Nemerovsky, fled Russia in the 1890s during a pogrom, the paper said.

Question Of Gay Rabbis

NEW YORK — The Conservative movement's rabbinical arm ended its 99th annual convention this month without a formal discussion of its stance on the placement and ordination of openly gay and lesbian rabbis. In a closed-door session, the executive vice-president of the Rabbinical Assembly (RA), Rabbi Joel Meyers, clarified the group's policy that all members in good standing are entitled to placement in a congregation. The RA's executive council is expected to address the issue at a meeting in June.

Moroccan Jews Lobby

RABAT — Moroccan Jews have announced the creation of a group to lobby for Middle East peace. The announcement came during a recent meeting of the World Rally for Moroccan Jews, held in Marrakesh. The biggest delegation to the conference came from Israel, which has some 600,000 Jews of Moroccan origin.

Family Demands Albright Return 'War Booty'

VIENNA — A wealthy Austrian family has demanded that U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright and her family return millions of dollars worth of "war booty" allegedly taken from their apartment in Prague after World War II.

Philip Harmer, head of a family of former Austrian industrialists and landowners, alleges that Albright's father, Josef Korbel, took 20 17th-century Dutch paintings, antique furniture and silver from his family's apartment in Prague.

"I cannot believe that the secretary of state of the U.S. and her brother and sister enjoy eating with my family's silver, while surrounded by my family's paintings and furniture," said Harmer, now a management consultant in Vienna.

Albright, who was raised a Roman Catholic and later became an Episcopalian, said she first learned she had Jewish ancestors when it was reported by the Washington Post in 1997.

Harmer alleges that when Albright's family returned to Prague after World War II, they took up residence in Harmer's vacated apartment, and demanded that a housekeeper tell them where priceless paintings had been hidden.

Education funding rally draws over 3,000 people

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An estimated 3,000 students, parents and teachers rallied at Queen's Park last week to call on the provincial government to fund independent religious schools.

The mood was festive, but the message was all business as speaker after speaker criticized the Ontario government for failing to support Jewish and Protestant schools while fully funding Roman Catholic educational institutions.

That situation smacks of discrimination and is contrary to the provincial government's own boast that its goal is to provide fair funding to all Ontario students, said Wayne Levin, a representative of Parents for Educational Choice (PEC), the grassroots group that organized the rally.

Fairness requires that independent religious schools receive the same financial backing as Roman Catholic schools, he said. "We ask for no special treatment."

More than 2,000 Jewish students and parents and about 1,000 students and parents from independent Christian schools attended the rally.

"I think it's a great show of unity," said Tina Van Beveren, the Ancaster, Ont.-based chair of PEC. "The purpose was to put a face to the children who are left out of funding, so we can say to the government, these kids are not part of the students who appear in government ads."

(In advance of the upcoming election, the provincial government embarked on a public relations campaign touting a basic universal grant for all Ontario students.)

Speaker after speaker challenged the provincial government to live up to its own policies of fair funding, with the mostly youthful crowd frequently breaking into chants of "fair funding for all," and "we are students too."

Human rights lawyer Irwin Cotler told the rally that the right to equal benefits and equal treatment under the law are basic principles of any free and democratic society. Withholding benefits to any segment of the population based on their religious affiliation violates those principles, he said.

"There's a name for that. It's called discrimination," Cotler said.

Frank Swoboda, a parent of five children in the Strathroy Community Christian School, told the crowd, "You have to pay for an education

THE SIX BIGGEST MISTAKES PEOPLE MAKE WHEN MANAGING THEIR INVESTMENTS

As Canadians, we should be spending more time thinking about investments and tax strategies.

Most Canadians spend too much time worrying about their RRSP portfolios and not enough time thinking about their overall investment strategy. Remember, your RRSP is limited to $13,500 and if you are in a pension plan, your maximum is even less.

3. People look for a guarantee of their dollars, rather than the conservation of their purchasing power.

When you place money in a savings account, GIC, T-bill, etc., you are in essence lending your money to a banking institution. Each year hundreds of thousands of Canadians park billions of dollars in go-nowhere, simple-as-mud investments which don't even return enough to cover inflation or cost-of-living increases; they do however warm the hearts of bankers.

While these types of "safe" investments guarantee you a rate of return in the form of interest, this interest usually fails to return to you the equivalent buying power of your original investment. In other words, as hard as it may be to believe, after you receive your interest on your original investment – 3, 5 or 15 years later – you are actually poorer than when you started.

Yes, the investment was safe. Yes, it grew. But did it accomplish your goal? If your goal is to accrue wealth, which is defined as the ability to purchase goods, you are actually losing ground because your purchasing power has decreased... "Whoops honey, I just shrunk our life-savings!"

Now you begin to see why it is essential to have a portfolio which accrues wealth faster than inflation can diminish it.

4. People forget about hidden government taxes.

When governments cut back or charge more for services, this is really a form of hidden taxation. Smart investors realize that they need to rethink their goals and to make sure their "nest egg" will be sufficient to cover these additional costs. Seniors are particularly vulnerable, as healthcare cutbacks effect the people who use the medical system the most.

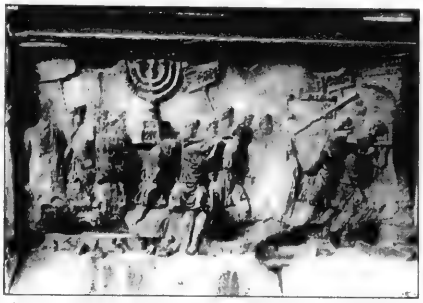
Remember Jerusalem

In 71 CE, following the Roman victory over the stubborn monotheists in Judea a year earlier, a victory procession was held in Rome in which the "spoils" from the temple in Jerusalem were paraded throughout the city.

The photo in this column is a depiction of that victory procession.

This depiction was engraved into the stone of the arch of Titus in Rome shortly after the conquering Roman legions returned home.



The Judeans' temple lay in ruins; the holy vessels were stolen; the people were slaughtered. Of those who survived, most were subjugated by the Roman oppressor, dragged off into captivity, far away from their homes.

In 65 years, the entire city would lay in ruins and Judeans (Jews) forbidden, at the point of the pagans' sword, from returning to their holy city and to their holy temple.

Dispersed to the far corners of the ancient world, and powerless against the rising forces of history, the Jews seared the memory of that city and that temple into the very marrow and substance of their collective identity.

They sang the songs of the city that their forebears had written some 600 years earlier. The poetry in those songs accompanied them through all the years and the places of their dispersion, and like the invisible magnetic undertow that directs a compass, steered their hearts unswervingly towards Jerusalem.

"How shall we sing the Lord's song in a strange land?

If I forget thee O Jerusalem, Let my right hand lose its strength..."

Of course, the Jews did return approximately 300 years later, only to be expelled again and to return again. Never, in the 1,900 years after the fall of the temple in 70 C.E. did Jews cease to travel to Jerusalem.

Never, in the 1,900 years after the fall of the temple in 70 CE did Jews cease to dream of returning to, resettling in, and rebuilding Jerusalem.

By the mid-19th century, Jews were the first to build new quarters outside the wall of the Old City. From then on, the population of Jerusalem, and in particular, that of the Jews of Jerusalem rose rapidly.

More than 100 years ago, the Jews became the majority in Jerusalem and have remained so ever since.

In 1948, no longer powerless against the rising forces of history, the Jews (Judeans) proclaimed and fought for a sovereign Jewish state. Once again, after the passage of nearly 1,900 years, Jerusalem became the capital of a sovereign Jewish state.

Nineteen years later, on the 28th day of Iyar, 5727, Wednesday, June 7, 1967, Jerusalem was restored to being a single, undivided, unified city. Except under the 19-year-rule of eastern Jerusalem by the Jordanians, the city had never in its history been divided.

Israel, and it is safe to say, almost all of the Jewish world, are determined that it will never be divided again.

Thus, on the 28 day of Iyar, we celebrate Yom Yerushalayim, the day set aside to commemorate the reunification of the city.

It is important that we remember Jerusalem.

The Palestinian Authority claims Jerusalem as its own capital.

The Vatican and the European Union have recently declared their preference that the status of Jerusalem revert to a corpus separatum, a separate city, controlled by neither Israel nor the Palestinians.

Canada's views upon the status of reunifed Jerusalem are unclear. But, having repeatedly referred to eastern Jerusalem as occupied territory, one may presume the Canadian government's attitude to be inimical.

The attitude of the Americans appears to support Israel's claim that Jerusalem is eternally its undivided capital. However, the U.S. administration has never unambiguously said so.

In defiance of the facts, and in oblivious disregard of history, western journalists almost always refer to east Jerusalem as Arab East Jerusalem, or simply as Arab Jerusalem. It is important, therefore, that we, the Jews of the world, remember Jerusalem.

YOM YERUSHALAYIM

It was 32 years ago that the IDF reunited the old and the new parts of Jerusalem. Jews around the world celebrate that reunification on the 28th day of Iyar, which falls this year on May 14. This archival photo of the "three generals" is one of the most famous photos associated with the reunification. From left, Uzi Narkiss, Central Command officer, Moshe Dayan, defence minister, and Yitzhak Rabin, chief of staff, enter the Old City through the Lions Gate.

Ontarians face old issues, new ridings in election

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ontario voters head to the polls June 3 facing old issues but new electoral boundaries.

Because Queen's Park has redrawn and reduced the number of ridings – from 130 to 103 – familiar Jewish electoral districts in the community, like Wilson Heights and Oriole, will be replaced by new boundaries that will conform in name and size to their federal counterparts.

Premier Mike Harris, a visible presence on the Jewish communal scene, will be tested in this vote, as polls show a tight race with Dalton McGuinty's Liberals. The NDP, led by Howard Hampton, trail with roughly 15 percent support.

The Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has identified four key issues in the vote:

Premier Mike Harris
...June 3 vote

• Education: The community's major demand, for the past 14 years, is for government funding of Jewish day schools, arguing that funding Catholic schools but not other religious-based systems is discriminatory. Because Jewish day schools receive no public funds, their students cannot access health services that are free in the public and separate systems. These services include speech therapy, audiology and counselling. Congress says denying children in private schools these essential services goes beyond finances.

• Elder care: There's a higher proportion of Jewish elderly (at least 18 percent of all Jews) than in the general population (12 percent). CJC says that care for the aged has moved away from institutional to home and community care. It says care for the aged must be universal, and integrate various services.

• Social housing: CJC states the province has withdrawn from this area and passed it to municipalities. This should not be tolerated, it argues, without guarantees that cities and towns can absorb costs.

• Hate propaganda: Congress has set its sites on the Internet, which it says is "not sacrosanct." It also calls on provincial officials to work with their federal counterparts to enforce anti-hate laws in the Criminal Code.

Races to watch include:

• Thornhill, estimated to be at least one-third Jewish. Lawyer Dan Ronen, brother of Canadian Jewish Congress president Moshe Ronen, is the Liberal candidate. He's facing Conservative hopeful Tina Molinari and Nathan Rotman for the NDP.

Earlier this year, Molinari found herself on the defensive after a telephone poll asked residents whether they would be comfortable voting for a "member" of CJC, and whether they would vote for the son of a Holocaust survivor.

Ronen's father is an Auschwitz survivor who accompanied Prime Minister Jean Chrétien on a high-profile trip in January to the former death camp.

Ontario's Tories subsequently apologized for the questions and fired the pollster. Molinari insisted she did not commission the poll, but refused to say who did.

Last month, Ronen caused a bit of a stir when he showed up at the community's Yom Hashoah rally sporting a visible Liberal-red campaign button.

• Willowdale, where Attorney General Charles Harnick, who came under fire for not pursuing pro-Nazi Ernst Zundel more vigorously, announced he would not seek re-election. Jewish former school trustee David Young has picked up the Tory banner. He's running against Fahimeh Mortazavi, who has held several government appointments and positions with the Public Service Commission. Running for the NDP is Mikael Swayze.

• St. Paul's, which federally, has long been a bellwether riding. Tory Isabel Bassett, considered a friend of the Jewish community, is running against Liberal Michael Bryant. Well-known broadcaster Larry Solway is running for the NDP, saying the party's stance is consistent with Jewish beliefs on ethics and social justice.

• York Centre, where longtime MPP and former cabinet minister Monte Kwinter is running and where the race is considered his to lose. Kwinter was challenged for the seat by fellow Liberal Annamarie Castrilli. The turf war resulted in several anti-Semitic missives directed at Kwinter. Castrilli shocked everyone by winning the nomination instead in Parkdale-High Park – for the Conservatives. Kwinter faces Tory Roberto Hausman and the NDP's Norm Jesin, a labor lawyer.

• Don Valley East, where David Caplan, who won his mother Elinor's old seat of Oriole in 1997, faces Education Minister David Johnson and the NDP's Janaki Balakrishnan.

• Eglinton-Lawrence, where two high-profile MPPs will slug it out. Liberal Mike Colle will face Tory MPP John Parker and Jay Waterman for the NDP. The winner stands to inherit more Jewish voters because of redistribution.

• Oak Ridges will encompass all of Richmond Hill and a good chunk of Markham. Running for the PCs is Frank Klees. He'll face Liberal Vito Spatasora and New Democrat Chris Moise.

Observers note that York Region's growing Jewish community stands to lose two representatives who were in cabinet: Al Palladini and David Tsubouchi.

There's a Jewish candidate in Hamilton: community volunteer Vicky Wylson-Sher is running for the Liberals in Wentworth-Burlington.

In the coming weeks, The CJN will profile the above ridings. Interviews with the party leaders have been requested.

Tragedy Has Struck

An extraordinary woman in our community—a 50 year old, single mother of 10 children, has tragically passed away after a serious illness.

Her modest salary as a secretary for one of our local Jewish Day Schools, allowed her to barely cover the basic family expenses, let alone the cost of expensive medical treatment and nursing care.

The children have been left with about $200k in debts and no further means of financial support. Funds are required for basic necessities such as food, clothing, housing and Jewish education.

The family desperately wants to stay together, with the older children taking on the responsibility of raising and ultimately marrying off the younger ones and themselves.

We appeal to you to support our community's efforts to establish a trust fund for these children. All cheques over $10 will receive charitable tax receipts. In the spirit of Jewish compassion and generosity at this holiday time, please open your hearts and donate generously. Thank you.

Pollster predicts dead heat

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

TORONTO — The May 17 general election in Israel will end in a dead heat, forcing a June 1 runoff, an Israeli pollster predicts.

Students choose Labor

The two leading contenders for the premiership, Benjamin Netanyahu of Likud and Ehud Barak of Labor (One Israel), will each win 37 percent of the popular vote, Tamar Hermann told a pre-election seminar, sponsored by the Canada-Israel Committee and the UJA Federation last week

Hermann, managing director of the Tami Steinmetz Centre for Peace Research at Tel Aviv University, is an authority on Israeli public opinion and peace movements.

According to Hermann, Yitzhak Mordechai, the centre party candidate, will capture 10 percent of the vote. Contrary to earlier expectations, the centre party will not emerge as a power in Israeli politics, she said.

Benny Begin, the far-right candidate, and Azmi Bishara, the Israeli Arab candidate, will each receive four percent.

Eight percent of the voters remain undecided, she added.

Hermann said that the Labor party will reap the greatest number of Knesset seats, 32 to 33. Likud and the centre party will pick up 24 to 25 seats and nine to 10 seats, respectively.

She expects Shas and the Arab parties to each acquire nine seats, while Meretz and Yisrael b'Aliyah will win seven to eight seats and five to six seats, respectively. Begin's party, National Unity, will garner four seats. The Third Way, with four seats in the last Knesset, will be shut out.

In Hermann's estimation, right-wing parties and left-wing parties will each win 48 to 50 seats. Centre parties will hold the balance of power, with 18 to 22 seats.

Of 33 parties running in the election, 11 to 12 will be represented in the 15th Knesset.

The majority of Israelis believe that the country should be governed by a national unity government, she said.

By her estimate, about 79 percent of the electorate strongly supports the currently stalled Oslo peace process. Voters respect Barak because they are certain that he will advance peace talks, but they think that Netanyahu will extract better terms from the Arabs.

Israelis regard the cleavages in Israeli society, rather than the peace process, as the major issue in the election, she observed. However, the two issues are inextricably related, since the peace process has hastened national disunity.

Voters do not have much confidence in political parties, nor do many of them watch political ads on television, she said.

Samuel Segev, a prominent Israeli journalist, said that the May 17 election could be the most important in Israel's history.

"All the problems we haven't been able to solve since 1949 will come to the forefront after the election," said Segev, referring to Israel's final borders, Jewish settlements in the territories, access to water supplies and Palestinian refugees.

Segev suggested that only a national unity government can come to grips with these pressing matters.

The next Israeli prime minister, whoever he may be, will head a "government of peace," said Segev, who wrote for Ma'ariv from 1957 to 1990 and whose book on the peace process, Crossing the Jordan, was recently published.

"Neither Barak nor Netanyahu will sacrifice Israel's basic interests for the sake of politics," he said.

As a result, the peace process will have to be resuscitated after the election, noted Segev, a lecturer at Hofstra University who teaches courses on Middle East politics and the media in Israel and the Arab world.

Segev said that the United States is absolutely determined to get the peace process moving again, and that President Bill Clinton regards it as integral to the success of his presidency.

Israel, he mused, is coping with the effects of fragmentation within its diverse society – the tension between Ashkenazi and Sephardi Jews, on the one hand, and secular and religious Jews on the other. He predicted that these problems would intensify.

Segev warned that the candidacy of Bishara poses an immense challenge to Israel, because he seeks to change Israel's identity from a Jewish state to a state of its citizens.

Canada 3000 imposes surcharge on all special meals

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada 3000 has instituted a surcharge of $10 on all special meals, including those requested for religious reasons, payable when the meal is served.

Passengers who order kosher, vegetarian, diabetic or salt-free meals – among others – are affected by the policy, which became effective May 1.

The change at Canada 3000, which flies to 85 destinations, "concerns and troubles" Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), wrote Manuel Prutschi, CJC's national director, community relations, in a letter to Angus Kinnear, president of the airline.

The policy is "discriminatory" and "will have an adverse impact on members of the Jewish community as well as members of other religious minorities and those with special health requirements," Prutschi wrote, urging the airline to reconsider.

"It's not discriminatory," Kinnear told The CJN by phone last week. "In the last 12 months, we've served over 42,500 special meals. We're now getting to the point where we are in the designer meal business and trying to run a restaurant not an airline.

"We are not in an à-la-carte restaurant business," he insisted.

If any passengers wish to bring their own food, "we are more than happy," he said.

Manuel Prutschi

There is "considerable cost" in providing special meals – even children's meals, he said, a contention Prutschi disputed in a second letter.

Prutschi wrote, "I am told that people in the airline industry estimate the added cost per special meal at roughly $3, a cost that drops to about $1 when it is distributed evenly among an entire passenger planeload.

"Furthermore, it is pointed out to me that airlines contract with a catering firm to the overall meal supplier, provide said caterer with a global budget, and it is the caterer who then matches menus, number and variety of special meals, etc. to that budget."

Prutschi contends there is thus no extra cost to the airline for special meals.

Reactions from some 150 customers who had booked Canada 3000 charter flights through Peerless Travel were "first of all, furious," said Lawrence Cherniak, manager of the 50-agent company, who personally informed a number of clients about the surcharge. For one family of six, the surcharge meant an extra $120 on their round trip to Vancouver, he said.

Clients were also unhappy about the necessity of paying on the airplane – some already feel embarrassed at being singled out when the meal is served, Cherniak said – and about being informed after the flights were booked.

He knows of no other airlines that charge extra for special meals.

Khanh LeKim, president of the Vietnamese Buddhist Association, and Mohammad Ashraf, director-general of the Islamic Society of North America – Canada, are among several community leaders joining Prutschi in protesting Canada 3000's new policy.

Leading Reform rabbi to visit

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It is up to Jews to demonstrate that they can redress the balance between the good and evil that wealth represents, according to a leading Jewish philosopher.

There needs to be more stress on personal ethics and less on social values, Rabbi Eugene B. Borowitz told The CJN from New York, where he is a professor at Hebrew Union College, Jewish Institute of Religion.

He will be speaking at Temple Sinai May 18 on how to handle money without allowing corruption to creep in.

"It's important to have money today and that is a dangerous thing to say, but we have been much too silent on how to handle it without going to the extremes of being realistic or idealistic, which are no good," Rabbi Borowitz said.

Speaking on Jewish moral virtues today (midot), he will deal with some of the factors which cause problems, such as less social restraint, more money to spend for personal reasons "and to some extent a harsher environment in which winning fame or money is the objective."

People today forget that throughout history, Jews have always had the problem of dealing with those who "are less than paragons of virtue," he said.

"As far back as the 10th century a Jewish philosopher was giving advice on personal values as if he had been reading a current copy of the Wall Street Journal," Rabbi Borowitz said.

His talk at Temple Sinai is being sponsored by the Dennis Waldman Foundation for Jewish Education in memory of Dennis Waldman's 10th yahrzeit.

Israelis vote

This issue of The CJN is the last one before Israelis vote for their next prime minister and for the members of their next, the 15th, Knesset. 4.28 million people are eligible to vote. It's very likely at least three-quarters of those eligible will actually cast a ballot.

Shmuel Segev, the veteran Israeli journalist and political scientist, has called this election the most important in Israel's history. He is convinced, regardless of the governing coalition that eventually emerges from the election, it is this government that will conclude peace treaties with Israel's Arab neighbors.

Segev harbors no illusions about the process that must precede the eventual peace treaties. "There will always be crises along the way of negotiating," he told a group of journalists last week at a CIC-sponsored seminar. "These crises are inevitable, given the nature of the serious issues to be resolved, and given the fact that tough bargaining is part of the culture of the Middle East."

Paradoxically, despite his view concerning the momentous security and foreign policy issues that the 15th Knesset will be called upon to resolve, Segev still believed that "domestic policies really determine the outcome of the election campaigns, not foreign policy." That will be no less the case in next week's election.

Complicating the domestic and foreign policy choices for the Israelis who are voting, and for the pundits who are merely observing, is the fact that 33 parties and five prime ministerial candidates are contending for votes.

According to Tamar Hermann, managing director of the Tami Steinmetz Centre for Peace Research at Tel Aviv University, and Segev's co-presenter at the seminar last week, the Israeli public divides into two virtually equal blocs of left and right.

She has predicted that the left and right blocs will both gain between 48 and 50 seats in the Knesset. The centre bloc will win between 18 and 22 seats. Similarly, according to Hermann, the vote for prime minister on the first ballot, assuming all the current candidates remain in the race, will result in a virtual tie, at 37 percent of the popular vote for both Barak and Netanyahu.

Given the seriousness of the issues facing the voters, and given too, the fact that the voters appear split in equal measure, a clear-cut result will not emerge from next week's election other than that Israeli society is a divided society seeking, but not yet finding, a single, clearcut approach to either domestic or foreign policy problems.

In that event, it will fall to Israelis and Diaspora Jews alike, to undertake all reasonable measures to ensure that a divided vote is not a springboard for a further divided society.

Jewish unity, tolerance, mutuality, respect and civility must still be our goals, and always also, our rallying cries.

Canada disappoints

Canada's voting record on Israel-related matters at the United Nations continues to disappoint. At a meeting on April 27 in Geneva, the UN Commission on Human Rights, Canada merely abstained on the motion that attempted to re-introduce the 1948 UN General Assembly Resolution 181 into the political picture of 1999.

The mischief in the motion is egregious.

It attempts to "acclimatize" the world to the idea that the Middle East clock can be put back 51 years. Resolution 181 called for the partition of Palestine into a checkerboard quite dissimilar to the current international boundaries between Israelis and Palestinians. It also proposed the internationalization of Jerusalem.

The clock cannot and should not be turned back.

We cannot help but express our deep disappointment with this latest ill-considered Canadian decision.

Harnick defends record at Queen's Park

I am writing in response to a letter written by Bernard Katz (CJN, Apr. 14). When I announced that I would not be seeking re-election, I received a letter from Keith Landy, chair of the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, dated March 30, 1999. I would like to quote from this letter: "We note with pride, both as Ontarians and Jews, your determination in battling hatemongers. As attorney general, you gave permission (as is required by law) to launch more prosecutions against those in our society who would spread hatred, than any of your predecessors. Your message was clear. You and your government would not tolerate hate in our society."

I question the motive prompting Mr. Katz's letter, and I am personally offended by its content.

Sadie Smith 104, may be oldest member

Re the article on Sarah Zelsman (CJN, Apr. 29), I applaud your recognition of this milestone.

It suggests that she might be the oldest member of Beth Tzedec Synagogue. If you check further you will find at least one older member, my mother, Sadie Smith,who is approaching her 104th birthday. My father (of blessed memory) and my mother joined Goel Tzedec Synagogue long before 1936, but I do not know the exact year.

By the way, my bar mitzvah was at Goel Tzedec Synagogue on May 13, 1939 (24 Iyar, 5699) and the rabbi was Samuel Sachs.

David Matas is another distinguished Winnipeger

No one can dispute the accomplishments of the Jewish Winnipeggers detailed in Jacob Mendlovic's letter (CJN, Apr. 9). The danger of such lists is that worthwhile persons may be omitted. Such I suggest is the case of David Matas, senior counsel for B'nai Brith Canada who has contributed thousands and thousands of hours working on behalf of refugees, the pursuit of Nazi war criminals, the search for Raoul Wallenberg and many, many more outstanding endeavors.

Other names should be on Winnipeg list

Re Jacob Mendlovic's letter on Winnipeg Jews of distinction (CJN, Apr. 9).

I can add a few names: Maxwell Cohen, dean, McGill University Law School; Dr. J.B. Rumberg, the first Jewish dentist elected president of the Winnipeg dental faculty; and Leo Romberg. The latter gave unstintingly, in the true sense of tzedakah, producing shows as fundraisers for many Jewish organizations.

British in Palestine acted in bad faith towards Jews

Re "Britain's mandate in Palestine examined" (CJN, Apr. 15).

This article was a good deal kinder to the British than they deserved. Britain & the Jews of Europe (Bernard Wasserstein), Palestine Triangle (Nicholas Bethell), and Open the Gates (Ehud Avriel), scholarly and meticulously researched, show that British policy on Palestine was motivated and acted out in bad faith towards the Jews.

The British wanted a way station that kept them near their possessions in Egypt (the Suez), India, Iraq, the oil in Middle East and lesser properties. The Balfour Declaration was written with the sole purpose of keeping England in Palestine, which they had been occupying and wanted to keep as a strategic base.

Two years prior to the Balfour Declaration, the British had signed a secret agreement with the French (The Sykes-Picot) dividing the Middle East area between them. They also had secret agreements with the Turks, the Russians, the Arabs (the elder Hussein, to make his sons kings) and several others. The reality is that they did not want a highly political people, such as the Jews in the area.

Perspectives

Remembering the St. Louis

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Guenter Krebs boarded the luxury liner SS St. Louis a happy-go-lucky young man. He even turned 18 while aboard. "Little did we realize," he writes in his neatly typewritten memoirs, "that this carefree atmosphere would not last beyond the first two weeks."

Krebs, who lives in Montreal and will turn 78 in a few days, grew up quickly.

But at least he had the opportunity to grow up. It is estimated that roughly half of his 935 fellow passengers aboard the ill-fated German refugee ship ultimately fell victim to the Nazis' Final Solution.

It's been 60 years since the doomed voyage of the St. Louis, whose name has become synonymous with the world's indifference to the plight of Jews fleeing Hitler's madness. The fate of its passengers was a microcosm of the Holocaust, with all the elements that permitted it to happen: anti-Semitism, red tape, immigration quotas and just plain apathy.

Above, the St. Louis set sail from Hamburg, bound for Cuba. Ursula Miller on board the ship at age 17, and [inset] today. Below, two girls peer from the ship.

The luxury liner set out from Hamburg – destination Havana, Cuba – on May 13, 1939, carrying high-spirited passengers armed with Cuban landing permits. Relief at having escaped Nazi Germany soon turned to terror, as the ship was unexpectedly and inexplicably refused entry to Cuba. Desperate appeals to western nations, including Canada and the United States, to grant the Jewish refugees asylum were turned down.

Denied a haven, the vessel was forced to return to an increasingly menacing Europe. Only at the last minute did four nations – Britain, France, the Netherlands and Belgium – agree to accept the passengers before the shipped finally docked in Antwerp. But when the Nazis overran the latter three countries, Jews became their first victims.

The ship's plight was dramatized in a 1976 Hollywood treatment, Voyage of the Damned, with an all-star cast that included Orson Welles, Faye Dunaway and Max von Sydow as the ship's captain.

And until Sept. 6, the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington is showcasing Voyage of the St. Louis, a special anniversary exhibit of artifacts and photographs.

Krebs, a retired comptroller and grandfather of four, was born in the German city of Breslau (now in Poland). His father was arrested after Kristallnacht, and taken to Buchenwald. Released six weeks later, thanks to the Iron Cross he had won in World War I, he, his wife and young Guenter were ordered to leave the Reich at once.

Armed with $10 (US), his father cleared Ellis Island and sent back money for his wife and son. His wife decided to send Guenter ahead to Hamburg, while she stayed behind in Breslau. The young man boarded the St. Louis, while his mother, spurning an offer to go to London, was shipped east and disappeared in Theresienstadt.

Once aboard, Krebs took full advantage of the ship's many luxurious amenities, like a swimming pool, dancing and shuffleboard. On the eve of the ship's arrival in Havana's harbor, he joined a group of revelers to toast their good fortune. But their joy soon turned to panic.

Despite the fact that everyone held legitimate landing permits, the pro-fascist Cuban government admitted only between 22 and 28 passengers. The answer for everyone else was no, or as Krebs recalls, manana (tomorrow).

On board, there was "ever-growing panic...everyone spent their days frantically waving and shouting to their friends and relatives waiting for them ashore." Finally, on June 2, the ship pulled up anchor, left Havana harbor and for the next four days, streamed in no-man's waters between Cuba and Florida, under the watch of the U.S. Coast Guard, before heading back to Europe.

On June 10, Britain announced it would accept 287 passengers. Because of his good English, Krebs was among them. A week later, the St. Louis ended its voyage to nowhere.

"Bedlam" is how Ursula Miller of Toronto describes the scene on deck when rumors spread that the St. Louis was returning to Germany. Her whole family – mother, brother and six aunts, uncles and cousins, were aboard the vessel. Her father had gone to Cuba earlier to prepare for their arrival.

"A few young hotheads wanted to take over the ship," she told The CJN, "but the older men calmed them down." Both Miller (née Spitz), who was also born in Breslau, and Krebs recall one desperate man who slashed his wrists and jumped overboard. Cuban authorities rescued him, but his ultimate fate is unknown.

The Jews were worried for good reason: Prior to leaving Germany, they all had to sign a document stating that if they ever returned, they would be sent to a concentration camp.

"It was very, very tense," remembers Miller, who was 17 at the time and now has three great-grandchildren. She, like Krebs, was taken in by Britain.

"The men formed a party that went around to make sure no one would commit suicide. The captain cabled everyone. Absolutely no one in the world would take us in."

Including Canada. On June 8, the ship's captain, Gustav Schroder, received a message from Frederick Blair, who was responsible for enforcing Canada's war-time immigration policy. The answer from Ottawa was no. The line, cabled Blair, had "to be drawn somewhere."

Opinions

An unexpected revival of Yiddish

By this time, many readers of the Jewish press are aware that Yiddish celebrations are in the offing for the next few months. They vary according to place and time, but the fervor that underlies the announcements I have received point in the right direction. The number of Yiddish speakers in the world is unknown to me, but the fact of the language being well and alive is incontrovertible.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The latest evidence comes to me from Germany. It is the land where Yiddish was born but where, in the course of the centuries, it became unknown.

There are two forms of Yiddish: western and eastern. The latter became the language of millions of Jews in eastern Europe, and migrated with them in the last century.

Not until I had read the studies of the late Dr. Werner Weinberg did I realize that the more than 200 words, expressions and phrases that were common in the German Jewish household where I grew up, represented the remnants of western Yiddish. Even though my family had been in the country for some 400 years or more, certain phrases had survived and become part and parcel of the fabric of Jewish speech. But these snippets, characteristic though they were, no longer were part of a complete language.

That was different in eastern Europe, and with the destruction of the Polish and Russian Jewish communities by the Nazis, it appeared that the language had died with them – and that the only source of revival would be found in the western hemisphere whence east European Jews had migrated or fled.

But now comes a brand new phenomenon: Yiddish has made a reappearance in Germany, not only with the immigration of Russian Jews, but also because the academic community has become enchanted with it. The University of Trier has established the first chair of Yiddish in Germany. A second chair has been founded at he University of Duesseldorf, and interest is strong.

The origin of the language can be traced to the 10th century when the first migrations of German Jews occurred. They spoke a form of medieval German and exported it to the countries where they settled. After the Black Plague, a few centuries later, hundreds of thousands fled to Lithuania and Poland, and took their language with them. In time, it developed its own character and grammar, acquired a mixture of Slavic elements and became the tongue familiar to millions.

Today, the liveliest centre of the language is probably found in many yeshivot around the world where Yiddish is the language of instruction and discussion while studying Talmud.

I had my first lessons in eastern Yiddish from an actor at the Second Avenue Yiddish Theatre in New York, in the 1940s. His name was Susanoff and his knowledge of English only tentative. He taught me the foundations of Yiddish, and I helped him to acquire a better knowledge of English. The two of us were an odd combination: both of us were linguistic newcomers in the New World, but our religion and, in time, the Yiddish language became our bond.

Of course, no one knows what development will yet lie ahead for Yiddish; it seems to have a thousand lives.

Bibi's down but not out

With only a few days left before Israelis go to the polls, the signs point increasingly to a victory for Labor party leader Ehud Barak as the country's next prime minister. But nobody yet is writing off incumbent Benjamin (Bibi) Netanyahu. That Bibi is even still in the running is itself a remarkable feat. Given his problem-plagued, scandal-filled term in office and the disdain so many people have for him, it is no small achievement that he is still a contender.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

To be sure, Bibi has his work cut out for himself if he's to stay in power.

Recent polls show him falling farther behind Barak after being locked in a tight seesaw battle for months. His drop in support may prove insurmountable, even for Israel's political Houdini, who in the past has manoeuvered his way out of numerous crises, often of his own making.

Admittedly, being prime minister of such a fragmented, dysfunctional democracy as Israel is a daunting task. Especially as almost every Israeli considers himself or herself equally as, if not more capable than elected officials of resolving the country's problems.

Bibi hasn't made it any easier for himself. It may be lonely at the top, but he has made it even worse. He seems to have a knack for alienating even his friends and colleagues. Many have defected from both his cabinet and his party, all attributing their move to disillusionment with Bibi. Their departure has only heightened his already strong siege mentality.

What is it about Bibi that rubs so many people the wrong way? His policies alone cannot explain why he has become arguably the most reviled prime minister in Israel's history. The visceral contempt so much of the public and most journalists harbor for him goes beyond the issues of the day. His wife hasn't helped matters much either.

There's something deeper at work, no doubt linked in part to circumstances leading up to the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin in 1995.

Indeed, by the time he was elected in 1996, most Israeli journalists (and foreign leaders) already had it in for Bibi. Many people will never forgive him for what they consider his active role in stoking the fires of incitement against Rabin in the months before his murder. What's more, they hold him personally responsible for the impasse in the Middle East peace process.

During his three years in power, Bibi has endeared himself to virtually no one. As a leader, he has done little to get close to the nation. He has shown himself as anything but a man of the people, appearing far more comfortable facing a TV camera than mixing in a crowd of compatriots. He's more convincing in English than in Hebrew. His body language betrays an awkwardness and wariness that engenders little compassion. Whether wearing a tie or a turtleneck, he comes across stiff and contrived.

And yet, despite his overly apparent miscalculations and personal failings, Bibi is still very much in the race, exuding confidence he'll win, even if his party, the Likud, looks like it's in for a shellacking.

The seemingly endless election campaign has left an already cynical public even more jaded. The past five months have been largely devoid of ideological or policy issues. With little debate over national concerns, the campaign has focused more on polls and personalities. Style and invective have triumphed over content, as both Bibi and Barak dance to the tunes of their exalted American political advisors.

For all of Bibi's problems, Barak has not exactly electrified the electorate either. If he captures the premiership, it will be likely in the second round of voting on June 1, and it will be thanks more to Bibi, or rather revulsion for Bibi than to Barak's appeal.

Barak may have commanded an eight-point lead in recent surveys but political analysts note that 10 percent of the electorate are still undecided and a last-minute dramatic development – such as a terrorist attack or a major Labor party gaffe – could swing many voters back to Netanyahu's favor.

"Netanyahu has a reputation as a brilliant political animal, although he's beginning to look like a wounded animal," commented Hemi Shalev, a columnist for the Ma'ariv newspaper. "But before he's eulogized once and for all, it must be remembered that in politics, as in nature, a wounded animal is sometimes the most dangerous of all."

The only safe bet so late in the campaign is that voters are eagerly looking forward to the elections. If for no other reason, this will signify the end of an insufferably long and uninspired election season.

The coalition of the willing

The long Israeli election campaign might not be decided until June 1, when the run-off (if necessary) takes place between the top two candidates for prime minister. After that, Israel will still not have a government until a coalition is formed and wins the approval of the Knesset. This might take a month or more, and during this time, the power of the prime minister-elect to make decisions will be very limited.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

However, immediately after a new government has been formed and takes office, it will be faced with a series of major decisions. There will be no grace period, and no time to get organized and gain experience on the job.

Lebanon is likely to be the first pressing issue. With attacks continuing, and mounting political pressure to change tactics, the government will have to decide whether to withdraw the IDF unilaterally from southern Lebanon, or to resume negotiations with Syria for a package deal including the Golan.

Either path involves many risks and uncertainties, but delay means more casualties, and mounting pressure to take action. Negotiations with Syria, even under the best of circumstances, will take many months, and in the meantime, Hafez al-Assad may again use attacks in Lebanon to press for major Israeli concessions on the Golan. Unilateral withdrawal, with the threat of punishing air attacks against Beirut and other targets in response to more terror, may be the best decision, but a narrow government resting on a small majority is likely to hesitate before taking the risk.

At the same time, the long-stalled negotiation process with the Palestinians will also be pounding on Benjamin Netanyahu's or Ehud Barak's door. The U.S. government has already announced that it will host a summit meeting immediately after the formation of a new government, to press for the implementation of last fall's Wye accord. However, this would only make sense in the context of a broader decision on the future of the Oslo process.

The Palestinian decision to postpone a unilateral declaration of independence provided a few more months, but the basic obstacles to a "permanent status agreement" remain.

In a period of six months or even a year, there is no chance, regardless of whether Barak or Netanyahu becomes prime minister, of agreement on Jerusalem, borders, Palestinian demands on refugees, settlements, and control over water. At best, the new Israeli government can negotiate towards a long-term interim agreement, delaying the harder issues until a new climate has been established, the foundation for hatred and terror is destroyed, and Palestinian expectations become more realistic.

If, as seems likely, this does not satisfy Arafat and the Palestinians, they are likely to return to unilateral actions and the use of violence to pressure Israel. If the Palestinians declare a state with borders that include all of Judea and Samaria in the West Bank, or perhaps claim areas that have been part of Israel since 1948, how will Israel react? The options include simply ignoring such a declaration (Arafat has already proclaimed independence twice, with no significant results), formal annexation of the areas that include major Jewish settlements, or even the dispatch of the Israeli army. The new government must be prepared for these options, with decisions and plans that include all the eventualities, and analysis of the implications of each option.

All of these issues must be tackled while also repairing the frayed relationship with the United States. Netanyahu and Bill Clinton, as well as officials and members of their respective governments, have been trading accusations and insults since the 1996 elections. This situation, which reflects personal differences more than disputes over policies, is unhealthy and damaging to both. (The Clinton White House cultivated Ariel Sharon as an alternative to Netanyahu, making him kosher again as foreign minister. However, after he was appointed, the Americans realized that they had made yet another mistake.) As soon as the new Israeli government is formed, it will have to turn to Washington and fix the broken lines of communication, to the extent possible.

While attempting to deal with these foreign policy issues, the domestic agenda will not wait. Without new approaches to the religious-secular divisions, relatively small but growing economic difficulties, as well as other sources of social tensions, national unity and consensus will be impossible. A narrow government with a weak base in the Knesset will face great difficulty in addressing the problems that have resisted any solutions in the past decade.

In the absence of a clear mandate, only a broad coalition, including Barak, Netanyahu, Natan Sharansky (whose party is likely to increase its strength in the Knesset), and some members of the religious parties, can hope to tackle these complex issues. Such a "coalition of the willing" might be able to create a national consensus, avoiding the stalemate and bitter divisions that have characterized Israeli politics for so many years. This is the best hope for Israel at this critical time.

The Kirshner File

Israel's options in Lebanon

Surprisingly enough, Lebanon did not flare as a burning issue in the Israeli election campaign, although it is Israel's only active war front.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and his chief adversaries, Ehud Barak and Yitzhak Mordechai, raised issues running the gamut from the anemic economy to the frozen Oslo peace process. Yet, in general, Lebanon did not figure prominently in the electioneering. This was a curious development, given the fact that the war in southern Lebanon grinds on.

On May 3, an Israeli soldier was killed by a roadside bomb. On April 28, eight soldiers were wounded fending off a Hezbollah raid against a fortification in Israel's self-declared security zone. On April 12, a soldier was killed near Arnoun, a town the Israeli army subsequently re-occupied. In March, the commander of Israeli forces in Lebanon, Brig. Gen. Erez Gerstein, was blown up by a mine which sent his armored car hurtling into a ravine. In February, the commanding officer of a special anti-guerrilla unit and several of his men died in a Hezbollah ambush.

Their deaths brought to nine the number of Israeli soldiers who have fallen in Lebanon since January. On average, Lebanon claims about two dozen Israelis per year, although the 1997 figure was 39 (a toll which excluded 73 troops who perished in the mid-air collision of two Lebanon-bound helicopters).

The war in Lebanon, which has been raging on and off since 1968, has a dynamic of its own. Each major batch of casualties touches off a round of handwringing and debate in Israel. Recent events have conformed to this pattern.

In March, following a series of deadly incidents during which Gerstein became a casualty, Netanyahu declared that Israel could not tolerate more such attacks. Taking his cue from Netanyahu, Defence Minister Moshe Arens said last month that if Israel continues to sustain serious casualties, "we will have to respond accordingly." Arens left it to Gen. Amos Malka, head of military intelligence, to elaborate. Malka warned the Lebanese government that Israel will take aim at targets deep in Lebanon if it co-operates with Hezbollah.

These ritualistic warnings reflect not only a sense of frustration in Israel's defence establishment, but a war weariness among most Israelis. They have grown tired of the status quo, and yearn for a viable exit strategy, the sooner the better, from this costly war of attrition.

As a result, 55 percent of Israelis favor an immediate unilateral withdrawal, according to a recent survey conducted by the Jaffee Centre for Strategic Studies at Tel Aviv University.

Israelis should have no illusions about the resolve and growing sophistication of Israel's foe, Hezbollah, which emerged in the 1980s. Backed by Syria and Iran, Hezbollah is absolutely determined to drive Israel out of Lebanon by making it pay dearly for maintaining its security enclave.

Israel created the zone in the aftermath of its 1982 invasion. But in reality, Israel has maintained a physical presence in Lebanon since Operation Litani in 1978. Ostensibly, Israel is in Lebanon to protect the northern Galilee from terrorist attacks. But to some Israeli politicians, notably those on the right, Lebanon and the Golan Heights – captured from Syria during the Six Day War – are inextricably linked.

Basically, Israel has three options in Lebanon.

It can expand the security zone, which stretches from the foothills of Mt. Hermon to the Mediterranean Sea. Raphael Eitan, the former chief of staff and currently the minister of agriculture, is the main advocate of an enlarged enclave.

It would worsen the problem. Israel's lines of communications would be stretched to the breaking point and would be more vulnerable to attack than now. Israel too, would have to rule, and subdue still more hostile Lebanese civilians, most of whom are sympathetic to Hezbollah.

Even then, Hezbollah's long-range artillery could still reach settlements in Israel.

Israel can negotiate its way out of the Lebanese quagmire by resuming bilateral peace talks with Syria – Lebanon's patron – over the disposition of the Golan. Netanyahu wants to reopen negotiations "without preconditions," yet publicly, he opposes a withdrawal from the Golan. Syria's position is just as clear: It will not return to the table unless the talks restart at the point at which they broke off in the winter of 1996.

There is no small measure of controversy over this question. Syria insists that Yitzhak Rabin agreed in principle to a withdrawal back to the June 4, 1967 frontier. Netanyahu claims that Rabin never committed himself to such a move.

In the absence of an agreement, Syria uses Hezbollah as a proxy by which to exert pressure on Israel to vacate the Golan.

Since the summer of 1996, Netanyahu has twice unveiled plans to disentangle Israel from Lebanon. "Our intention...is to leave Lebanon," explained Netanyahu last autumn. "But only under the necessary security conditions."

These conditions have remained constant: direct negotiations with Lebanon, guarantees from the Lebanese government for the security of the Galilee, and the integration of the South Lebanon Army – Israel's surrogate – into Lebanon's army.

Rejecting these conditions, Lebanon insists on an unconditional withdrawal based on United Nations Security Council Resolution 425, which Israel has accepted. Syria's objections are far more serious, since Syria, for all intents and purposes, controls Lebanon. Syria rejects any plan which excludes the Golan from a deal.

If Israel refuses to relinquish the Golan within the framework of an accord with Syria, all its efforts to extricate itself from Lebanon will inevitably fail.

Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah

Recognizing this, Barak recently promised to bring home the troops within a year of his election as prime minister. But his proposal was short on details.

Israel's third option is a unilateral withdrawal. It has been endorsed by Shimon Peres, the former prime minister, and Yossi Beilin, the former deputy foreign minister and architect of the Oslo accords. Its opponents include Netanyahu, Arens and Gen. Shaul Mofaz, the current chief of staff. (Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon has suggested a fourth alternative, an immediate phased withdrawal based on security guarantees).

A unilateral pullout is not without merit. From behind a fortified international border, Israel would be morally and politically free to retaliate with all the means at its disposal. Under the rules of engagement set out by the 1996 Grapes of Wrath accord, Israel is obliged to exercise considerable military restraint.

Once it leaves Lebanon, even without a binding agreement, Israel could deploy its considerable firepower and technical advantage to strike Syrian bases in Lebanon, and if necessary, to cripple Lebanon's infrastructure. Lebanon and Syria are perfectly aware of these scenarios, and Israelis of all political persuasions would rally around a policy in which Israel is defending its territorial integrity rather than occupying part of a neighboring country.

Would Hezbollah lay down its arms in the event of an Israeli withdrawal? The signs are mixed. Last year, Hezbollah's spiritual leader, Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah, suggested that he would be amenable to a settlement based on a complete Israeli pullout. But recently, he called on his followers to "eliminate the Jewish state." Is this merely rhetoric or policy? We won't know unless Israel tests the waters.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Making a Jewish choice

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Ostensibly, the gap between assimilated and religious, or more accurately, between those swept into the fury of modernity's rip tide and those purporting to avoid the undertow, is an ever widening one.

In truth, the same crucial and perplexing dilemmas face those in both camps. Recent bitter disputes in a particular segment of the Toronto Orthodox community, specifically with regard to the education of teenage girls and the possibility of one school being split into two over issues pertaining, in an indirect sense, to the influence of secular culture, have proven to be a particularly instructive cautionary fable about Jewish life in our time. (I remain blissfully ignorant of the persons and precise details involved in this drama, but the general gist of the matter is all too familiar).

Every Jew, of every denomination, in every place, is now a Jew by choice. Whether one comes from a totally unaffiliated background and is exploring religion for the first time, or boasts 10 generations of rabbis in the family and has known Shabbat observance from the cradle, today one is required to actively and consciously decide to be Jewish, not to mention halachic, in a society that provides a plethora of alternatives.

Our ancestors could not have envisioned the dazzling array of such choices. They often were born and died in the same place; their contact with gentiles was commercial or non-existent; their religious life was seamlessly organic in the sense that everyone they knew displayed, at least on the outside, similar religious behaviors.

We, on the other hand, have to choose, not just what toothpaste or shampoo to buy, but whether we believe in God or think the universe is godless. Should we attend synagogue services on Saturday morning or go golfing? Marry Jews or non-Jews, or not marry at all? Treat Jewish law as binding on us or dismiss it as archaic? And a dozen shades in between.

So unless we wish to return to closed societies or ghettos (a fantasy or a nightmare, depending on your perspective, but an unrecoverable illusion all the same), we must be willing to confront what happens when our children – all of our children, from ultra-Orthodox to Jewishly illiterate – are exposed to the west's enormous variety of entertainments and products.

Whether, on the one hand, fleetingly glimpsed in a billboard, overheard in a conversation, surreptitiously downloaded from the Internet, or, on the other hand, openly and unthinkingly absorbed in large doses of television and People magazines – the possibility of the "other life," the world "out there," remains omnipresent for everyone. And it will not go away, not now and not in the future.

So this presents a rather painful quandary. Is the risk of alienation from traditional religious teaching the price that we pay for living in an open, liberal democratic society? Can our youth be insulated from the assembly line of superficial schlock that inundates every corner of the globe? And what of the valuable parts of the west – from Beethoven to Wordsworth, Einstein to Rembrandt – do these get thrown out with the lowbrow bath water as well?

Given how long these questions have actually been non-theoretical, it is shocking how ill-prepared Jewish communities are to deal with their ramifications. Dollars, not sense, seem to underline our communal discourse. You can divide a school into two parts or 20, but any attempt to stuff the genie of contemporary culture back into the historical bottle will end in failure. The solution lies elsewhere.

Set your sites on the leaders

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

When Israelis go to the polls next week, they will not only be choosing the members of the 15th Knesset, they will also be voting for the prime minister who will lead Israel into the next century. Today, a look at those candidates and their sites on the Internet. Note that most of the official sites are in Hebrew only.

Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu has several sites backing him. You can find a message and his biography at the Likud site [http://www.likud.org.il/english/navframeb1.html]. But there's much more about Netanyahu at the official prime minister site. Although this site is, strictly speaking, not a partisan site, it is full of information explaining Netanyahu's beliefs and strategy [http://www.pmo.gov.il].

Labor party leader Ehud Barak's Web site has a large archive of speeches and policy statements. You'll also find a comprehensive biography of the candidate who was foreign minister in the government of Shimon Peres [http://www.ehudbarak.co.il]. For more support of Barak, see [http://www.click2.co.il/ehud-barak/].

Although Ze'ev "Benny" Begin has been painted as an earnest candidate, his was the only official Web page where I found a joke – from Groucho Marx, no less: "These are my principles. If you don't like them, I have others." [http://www.begin.org.il/cv.htm]

For an interesting profile of the leader of Herut, see the Jerusalem Post's Benny Begin: The Great Right Hope [http://www.jpost.com/com/Archive/31.Jan.1999/Features/Article-19.html]

The fifth candidate is MK Azmi Bishara. According to the Jerusalem Post, Bishara describes himself as a humanist, democrat, liberal and neo-Nasserist, who advocates turning Israel into a secular, democratic state with cultural autonomy for its Arab citizens [http://www.jpost.co.il/Info/Elections99/candidates/bishara2.shtml]. I couldn't find an official Web page for the Israeli Arab candidate, but I did come across an interview in which Bishara describes the feelings Palestinian refugees have had toward the land since 1948 [http://msanews.mynet.net/MSANEWS/199712/19971226.11.html].

You can find more online information about the candidates. The Jerusalem Post has in-depth profiles [http://www.jpost.co.il/Info/Elections99/index.shtml] as does the Hebrew-language Yedioth Aharonot [http://www.elections-yedioth.co.il/FrMoamadim.HTM].

It's fine to read what the experts are saying, but the real fun and arguments are at the online forums [http://www.iol.co.il/forums/main.htm]. There we learn that "Begin is the only candidate who isn't a liar, but electing him could bring world war." And "If Barak wins, Israel loses." Or "Only an idiot will vote for Bibi twice." Most of the messages are in Hebrew.

Even if you're not Israeli, you can still vote from the comfort of your keyboard [http://come.to/the_kalfi]. This online poll is hardly a scientific sampling, but at last count, Netanyahu and Barak were neck in neck. And over at the Gamla site, you can find the latest Gallup and other professional polls [http://www.gamla.org.il/english/elect/index.htm].

If you couldn't bring yourself to vote for Netanyahu, Mordecai, Barak, Begin or Bishara, then how about Zanvel, Gefen, Goldberg, Bartal or Naaman? Those are just five of the many young candidates who have thrown their hats in to the ring to be virtual prime minister. You can find their biographies and platforms at the educational Snunit site [http://gifted.snunit.k12.il/activities/elections/prime.html]

OK, these budding leaders probably won't win this race. But as every true politician knows, there's always next time.

Fostering self-esteem

By RABBI MOISHE NEW

In the aftermath of the tragedies in Littleton and Taber, given the fact that the teenage perpetrators were products of mainstream Americana, we have come to realize that the problem must lie with our culture itself.

Among the suggested ills of contemporary society, we have heard the following: Firearms are far too accessible. The task of raising children is often virtually abandoned by the parents. The nurturing family unit has become, for many, a relic of the past. In the name of entertainment, children are fed staggering numbers of cruel, violent and destructive images on a daily basis.

The root of the problem is, I believe, a fundamental lack of self-esteem. A lack so deep that it renders life and living meaningless. It has long been recognized that low self-esteem can head to aggression.

The sad irony though, is that the measures we have taken – guided by psychologists et al – to instil self-esteem in our young, has created an illusory, inflated self-esteem, unjustified and unstable.

By overindulging our children, we produce narcissistic, self-absorbed, self-centred individuals, super-sensitive to criticism or slight. Deep down they suspect that their feelings of self-worth are built on quicksand. In reality the child is left with a painful and gnawing inner emptiness.

How do we cultivate true self-esteem?

Self-esteem is achieved when I believe that I am valuable and that I make a difference. The only way that I can sincerely believe that I have intrinsic and immutable value is when I know that I have a purpose. There is a Creator who has a master plan and I am part of it.

A child must be taught that God cares and is concerned about his or her welfare, that God is ever present, ever watchful. Above all, the child must know that God has given us responsibilities. God wants something from me. We are here to fulfil a purpose.

In a few days we shall celebrate Shavuot, the festival of the giving of the Torah. The very word Torah means instruction. In it, God has expressed His objective and the role that He has given to each and every human, Jew and non-Jew. Through carrying out His commandments, by performing acts of goodness and kindness, we make this world a place where all humanity can live in peace and prosperity. Each and every one of us is integral and indispensable to this goal and is therefore infinitely precious.

Self-esteem is created with the realization that the reason I am valuable is not because of self per se, because of my talent or beauty or status. This kind of self-esteem is subject to erosion and often has no validity to begin with.

Rather, true self-esteem is rooted in the knowledge that I am valuable because the Creator has chosen to give me value. Nobody and nothing can ever take that away. My value then is expressed when I carry out His mandate, when my life is purposeful.

A moment of silence (not ritualized prayer) in the public schools at the start of each day to reflect upon these truths would contribute immeasurably in fostering a sense of identity and purpose. Thus we will have laid the foundation for children to be imbued with healthy and enduring self-esteem.

Chag Samayach and best wishes for a healthy, happy and peaceful summer.

Confronting the apocalypse

Apocalypses*, by Eugen Weber (Random House, $29.95).

Is the world about to be destroyed? Are we approaching the apocalyptic end of days? An increasing number of people are apprehensive and relate their fears to the approaching millennium.

The author writes that in the 20th century, the idea of universal doom seems less than surprising. "Movie and television screens, which hold the mirror to our times, testify to the popularity of disaster films... Monsters and space alien invasions inspire epics of global destruction that threaten the end of civilization, the extinction of the human species, the obliteration of the fragile platform on which we stir. Endism is in fashion once more because it provides a context: an ideology of catastrophe."

Jewish apocalyptic teaching has it that at the end of days, in the time of the Messiah, when the resurrection of the dead will take place, both Israel and the gentile nations will be summoned to Divine judgment by the blowing of the great shofar.

The prophet Elijah will come back to earth to reconcile families, "returning the hearts of fathers to their children and of children to their fathers, before the great and dreadful day of the Lord" (Malachi). The Day of Judgment will be a terrifying day of darkness (Amos 5:18), with tempest, thunder and consuming fire (Isaiah 29:6).

Attempts to set dates for the coming of the Messiah have toyed with many different and ingenious techniques. The most common was deciphering the specific dates listed in the Bible, especially the Book of Daniel. Speculators would employ gematria (interpreting a word according to the numerical value of its Hebrew letters). For example, in the Book of Leviticus, we read: "In this year of the Jubilee shall ye return." (25:13). In this verse are 18 Hebrew letters, whose numerical values, when added together, total 5,408. The Hebrew year 5408 corresponds to the civil year 1648. One of the most notorious pseudo-messiahs in Jewish history, Shabbetai Zevi, turned to gematria. With it, he predicted that he, as the Messiah, would make his grand entrance in the year 1648.

Most Jewish authorities vehemently opposed these messianic calculations. Rabbi Jonathan, in the second century, denounced them: "Perish all those who calculate the time of the coming of the Messiah, for people will say that, since the predicted time is here and the Messiah has not come, he will never come." Opponents to these forecasts were fearful that such calculations would awaken false hopes. If these hopes were dashed, the people would become irrevocably demoralized.

In 1997, Michale Drosnin's Bible Code became an international best-seller. If the 304,805 Hebrew letters of the Torah are arranged in rows, names apparently appear that can be read straight-forwardly, diagonally, upside-down, or backwards, and these foretell the future, especially if it is past. Drosnin believes that the code helped avert nuclear war in 1996, and may prevent Armageddon in the near future.

Many Christians believed – and some still do — that the end of days will follow the restoration of Jews to their ancient homeland. In 1891, for example, a petition signed by over 400 eminent Americans, including Cyrus McCormick, J.P. Morgan and John D. Rockefeller, urged President Benjamin Harrison to advance "the purpose of God concerning His ancient people" by supporting the cause of a Jewish state in Palestine. An Israeli forest is dedicated to one of the petition's organizers, William Eugene Blackstone.

The author, an eminent historian, presented the book's major ideas as part of the 1999 Barbara Frum Historical Lecture at the University of Toronto. This book, of course, is part of a vast popular genre of literature that deals with prophecies, cults, and millennial beliefs through the ages.

This ambitious survey – crammed with facts, names and dates – is not unmixed with sympathy for the credulity, superstition, fear and ignorance of human beings in the face of a mysterious universe and their ever precarious existence.

TORONTO — A Lubavitch yeshiva celebrated Jewish pride and unity last week with a festive Lag b'Omer parade.

Twenty teenage boys from the Lubavitch Yeshiva arranged the parade for local Jewish schools such as Cheder Chabad and Or Menachem Academy.

The march began at the corner of Bathurst and Steeles, and proceeded north along Bathurst until it came to a park near Chabad Gate.

Shmaryahu Weinbaum, 24, a student from the yeshiva, says that the parade is in honor of Lag B'Omer, the Jewish festival celebrating nature.

On the back of a car, a "tree" made of chicken wire, insulation and styrofoam followed the paraders. It was decorated with baseballs and candies, incentives to delight the children.

"It is how the tree will look very soon, when the Mashiach comes," says Weinbaum.

Neon banners stressing the importance of good deeds were held by volunteers and children. Most read Put on tfillin! or Keep Shabbat Holy. Clowns, dancing and singing topped off the event at York Hill Park.

One of the other co-ordinators, Raleigh Resnick, 18, called the parade "stupendous" considering he and his friends only thought of the idea 20 hours before it began. He is also pleased, he said, that the day was based around youth spreading Jewish pride.

The parade raised over $2,000 donated by local Toronto businesses.

ISRAEL AT THE CROSSROADS

Israel's elections this May will be the most critical in its 50 year history.

If ever there was a time for the voices of peace and moderation to be heard, this is it. Polarizing forces are tearing the country apart on issues such as religious extremism vs. secularism and pluralism; and on the peace process - between those who seek its progress and those who cause its paralysis.

Mainstream Israelis now accept the inevitability of Palestinian "statehood" and further territorial concessions. By skilful diplomacy, Israel can shape these developments in ways more favourable to its security needs. If Israel fights this "statehood" and further territorial concessions however, it will not thwart them, but will only ensure that they are achieved through conflict and bitterness.

Israel is now at a crossroads. The results of May's election will set a decisive course for its future. While we as Canadian Jews do not have a vote, we do have a voice. We are speaking out from across the ocean in solidarity with all those Israelis who, on May 17, will vote for the forces of peace and moderation.

Students choose Labor party in mock Israeli election

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Grade 7 students, Deborah Kanter and Leah Herman were old enough to vote in the recent election for Israeli prime minister, which saw Ehud Barak win with a landslide victory.

Strong Labor supporters, both girls could easily articulate the reasons for their choices. Leah said that Barak's peace platform would make Israel safer, while Deborah felt that "peace will make Israel a better place."

The girls were among dozens of young voters who cast their ballots at the election booth, one of the exhibits at the Israel Fair held recently at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (JCC). The fair was sponsored by the Downtown Jewish Community School (DJCS), as well as the Bloor JCC and the Downtown Jewish Community Council.

The election booth was sponsored by the DJCS's Grade 7 class.

Teacher Marcia Slavens, who also runs the school family education program, said she decided to have the Grade 7 class run an election booth – a first for the annual Israel Fair – because one of her students, Sami Share, had done an exceptional job researching the candidates and the election issues.

All the students prepare an independent project and present it to the class, Slavens explained. "Sami chose to do the election. It's really a difficult topic...She was confident she would be able to do it. She did a fabulous job."

Sami told The CJN she was interested in the election because she "wanted to be up to date on what was happening. I read about the elections and got information."

Initially, Slavens was only going to hold the election for the class, but she later decided to involve the whole school. She said she had read that mock elections are common in Israeli schools.

Any child over 10 who could understand the issues outlined in the election posters was eligible to vote; background information on each candidate was simplified and posted at the voting booth, Slavens said.

Many of the booths at the Israel Fair were sponsored by the DJCS classes and run by the children and their parents. Visitors entered the fair by passing through the Ben Gurion Airport booth, run by Grade 1, where they were given passports and information about the various Israeli landmarks.

Visitors could see various sites in Israel, among them Hebrew and Haifa universities, booths sponsored by grades 5 and 4a respectively; Lake Kinneret, a fishing booth sponsored by Grade 6; and Eilat, a booth sponsored by Grade 3.

Participants could also go to a cardboard replica of the Kotel and place messages in the cracks of the wall. This booth, which included posters and 3-D miniatures of sites in Israel, was sponsored by Grade 4.

The poster and some of the 3-D displays were the products of a family education program consisting of an assignment on Israel that was to be done at home, teacher Rachel Urowitz explained.

Parent Sally Danto, who did a project on Eilat with her family, said she found family education was beneficial. "It gives you something to do together. The fact that it is Jewish is a bonus."

They want Jewish grown-ups to stop arguing...

...and to start teaching.

This year, while adult Jews bickered about what divides us, 200,000 young Jews from 35 countries and every synagogue group learned what they have in common.

These youngsters, age 13-16, took part in the third annual International Competition for Jewish Identity, sponsored by Bar-Ilan University in Israel.

At Bar-Ilan University, we think of this contest as an insurance policy for the Jewish people. Participants study a core curriculum jointly co-authored by religious and secular educators who agreed on what every Jew should know about Jewish history, culture and traditions. By sharing the same knowledge base, Jewish children the world over may someday forge the kind of unity that Jewish adults sorely lack just now.

The competition's international finals will be held in Israel on May 31. Six young people will receive one-year scholarships to study at Bar-Ilan University. But the real winner will be the Jewish future.

At Bar-Ilan University's International Center for Jewish Identity, we have many other ideas for tackling the tough problems that divide the Jewish people.

We think it is time to stop pointing fingers and to start joining hands.

If you want to learn more about how we are helping Jews work together for our collective future, please write to: Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University, 1750 Steeles Avenue West, Suite 214, Concord, Ontario L4K 2L7. Or call 905-660-3563. Or e-mail: barilanc@inforamp.net.

Inter-synagogue singles group designed as support system

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — One of the mandates of a new inter-synagogue group for singles, ages 35 to 55, is to provide a support system for its members.

Ferne Kirschner, chair of Beth Tikvah Progressive Singles, and founder of the inter-synagogue group, said she approached her synagogue board with the idea about a year ago, when she realized that singles in that age group had very little community support in certain times of crisis.

"When someone dies or becomes ill, people rally around the rest of the family. When a marriage breaks down, however, and someone's life is in turmoil, there is no support system.

"When people are alone, they need contact with others, to take away the loneliness."

The objectives of the group, which started with Kirschner and three other members, is to liaise with other synagogues, provide programs with traditional Jewish values, and encourage members to give of themselves.

"There are so many people who spend holidays alone, but are ashamed to reach out to others. People without a strong support system feel a void during the holidays," said Kirschner.

The synagogues involved, which now include Beth Tikvah, Adath Israel, Shaar Shalom, Temple Sinai, Beth Tzedec and the Hebrew Beach Institute, will each take turns hosting the group for one year. This year, the group, chaired by Claudette Edghill, will meet at Adath Israel, the host synagogue.

Since the group began about a year ago, said Kirschner, "friendships have been formed, and people have helped each other out. They are connecting, and not feeling so alone and isolated."

Group activities have included Bible study classes, lectures and brunches, "and everything has been well attended," said Kirschner. "I don't know where these people were before we started up."

A drop-in is scheduled at Beth Tikvah on the last Wednesday of every month, and an information hotline (221-3433, ext. 352) has been set up.

Kirschner said that the group supports other singles events in the community and makes every effort not to schedule its activities at the same time as another function.

Canadian Jews open pocketbooks for Yugoslav refugees

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jews have raised $100,000 for refugees from Yugoslavia, according to Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) president Moshe Ronen.

Part of this money is to help Albanian Jews, who number 50 to 80 people, Ronen told the CJC Ontario region executive.

He also said there is a Jewish community in Yugoslavia, and a synagogue there has been hit.

The Israeli public has responded to a request from the Jewish Agency and sent nine planeloads of supplies to the Kosovar refugees.

Though the CJC supports the Canadian government action, "we have not commented on whether bombing is the right thing. We have to recognize that civilians are being killed," Ronen said.

In other matters, he announced that, for the first time, the executive of the World Jewish Congress, numbering about 30 people, will meet in Toronto or Ottawa June 8 and 9.

Ronen also reported that Opposition leader Preston Manning has expressed support for a national Holocaust museum in Ottawa, as a result of meetings with CJC officials.

The Ontario election June 3 has not caught the region's political liaison committee by surprise, its coordinator Hershel Sahian said. The committee's stand on election issues will be delivered in the form of a printed brochure to all candidates.

The committee has already met 15 sitting MPPs, including the majority of the cabinet, and has had meetings with candidates in ridings with a large Jewish vote. Other meetings with candidates will be held.

The main issue is the need for public funding of religious schools and the absence of special health services for those not in public schools, Sahian said.

The need for services for Jewish seniors, of whom there are a disproportionate number, is also a "major, major" issue, he said.

New social housing is another need, as no subsidized housing has been built for five years.

Other issues listed in the brochure are hate on the Internet and the need for national unity.

Life takes unusual turns for rebbitzen

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It seems like a giant leap from writing advertising copy and from teaching aerobics to being a rebbitzen, but, as Lori Palatnik, believes, "a mensch tracht un Gott lacht," which loosely translates as "man proposes and God disposes."

"You never know what turns your life will take," she told The CJN recently in an interview.

Palatnik, 38, grew up in Toronto, in what she calls "a classically Jewish family. We went to shul on the holidays, had 'Stanley Cup' seders, and ate latkes on Chanukah."

Nevertheless, she said, three of the four children in the family are now observant.

She lived a happy and successful life, both here and in Israel, doing advertising, and radio copywriting and production.

She also ran an aerobics business in Jerusalem, which became so successful, she had to take on two employees to help her.

But her life was taking a more spiritual turn. She studied at EYAHT, Aish HaTorah College for Jewish Women, in Jerusalem.

She met her husband of 12 years, Rabbi Yaakov Palatnik, at Aish HaTorah, where he was teaching Gemarah. The couple now has five children.

While they had planned to live in Israel, they agreed to accept a position with Aish HaTorah in Toronto, first at the Thornhill facility, and most recently founding and developing the Village Shul (the name comes from its location in Forest Hill Village).

Palatnik is obviously thrilled about the shul, and about the people who come to it.

"They are the greatest people in the world," she enthused. "They have become our closest friends. They would do anything for me – and I would do anything for them."

The Palatniks' approach, like that of Aish HaTorah generally, is non-judgmental. "We are here to teach," she explained. "We are not here to insist you become observant, and there is no sense of failure if you don't."

She wants the congregation to know that "we are with you in good times and in bad, for life cycle events and as resource people."

The family began to host people for Shabbat, many of whom had never experienced a real Shabbat before, and wanted to know how to do it in their own homes.

"I was very frustrated. People would call and ask me if there was a book that would help, and I kept saying that there wasn't."

Finally, encouraged by her husband, Palatnik wrote and had published Friday Night and Beyond; the Shabbat Experience Step-by-Step (Jason Aronson, 1994). As the name suggests, it is a practical, detailed description of the different mitzvot of Shabbat.

Descriptions of different customs, blessings, recipes, and personal anecdotes make this book helpful for the neophyte Shabbat observer and a renewing source for the experienced.

Her second book, Remember My Soul (Leviathin Press, 1998), was written in response to a neighbor's comment that Jews don't believe that there is anything after death.

Palatnik is more than a writer. She teaches classes on various Torah topics all over the city, appears on television, and lectures extensively throughout North America.

She laughs that she is certainly not the stereotypical repressed Orthodox woman. It is important to her "to channel my talents and experiences, and elevate [them]."

"Unforgettable and unmissable.

TORONTO — While women have been gaining equality in western democracies, Israeli women, who had more equality than other women back in 1948, had lost much of their political clout by the 1970s, according to one of Israel's leading feminist activists.

Prof. Frances Raday, the Lieberman chair in labor law at Hebrew University, and the founding chair of the legal centre of the Israel Women's Network, said she thought Israel was "a land of hope, social justice and equality," but when she made aliyah in 1968, she discovered "that equality for [Israeli] women was a myth."

Raday, and judge Harriet Sachs of the Ontario Superior Court, were the featured speakers at an evening called The Challenge of Change: Influencing the lives of Israeli and Canadian Women. The evening, which drew some 100 people, was held at Osgoode Hall, and was sponsored by the Toronto chapter of the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University.

Sachs and Raday both spoke about the changes in the law vis-a-vis women's rights in Canada and Israel, respectively.

Sachs noted that laws pertaining to women's issues were more favorable, and that there was increased presence of women in the legal profession, with women making up roughly 50 percent of law school student body in Canada.

Raday said, given the legal strides made by Canadian women in the last two decades, she was "less optimistic" about the outcome of Israeli women's quest for equality.

With 12 percent of the Knesset made up of women, the State of Israel in 1948 was one of the most egalitarian countries in the world, she said. "Israeli women had equality when the rest of the world was not yet talking about equality."

But by 1970, women's representation in the Knesset dropped to 7.5 percent, ranking Israel just above Southeast Asia and the Arab countries in terms of the number of female-elected representatives, she noted.

She said there is an intrinsic problem with the Israeli constitution because it does not include the right to gender equality.

Lack of interest

The first large feminist demonstration held in Israel – it was organized by Betty Friedman in 1984 — was not covered by the Israeli media, Raday said. The women barged into a meeting attended by Shimon Perez and Yitzhak Shamir, demanding equality, but the demonstration was not even reported on the news, she recalled.

"There was a total lack of interest in equality. There was a total lack of interest in women helping women."

Raday said she was part of an academic group called the Israel Women's Network, which was established to press for legislative reform.

She called the period from 1988 to 1998, the "golden decade" because the women's network succeeded in getting feminist legislation enacted in a number of areas.

The changes that favor women include: a progressive rape law and comprehensive sexual harassment laws; making retirement age for women the same as for men; changing maternity leave to parental leave; and giving divorced women the right to their husband's pensions.

Raday noted that while the laws are progressive, their interpretation by the judiciary, particularly those justices in the lower courts, is not favorable to women. "The lower courts are not empathetic to women's problems."

Survivors gather for conference

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — To Holocaust survivors, the Holocaust is not over; only a grave will silence us, said Nate Leipciger, moderator of an emotional public meeting at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

The four panelists at the recent presentation attended by 400 people said time is running out, and the critical need is for second and third generation survivors to help their parents or grandparents.

The evening's sombre note was struck by Leipciger who said he recently sat at the bedside of his brother-in-law, who had an "insatiable drive" to talk abut what happened to him.

"Harry died, but he opened up on his death bed. He needed someone to listen. He was forced to work in a chemical factory at the age of eight, and this is what destroyed his kidneys. He was released from Buchenwald at the age of 10."

Fifty percent of all the patients at Baycrest, including those in day care, are survivors, said Patty Friedland, a member of the family that helped sponsor the international meeting. Baycrest has developed special programs to aid survivors and to train staff members looking after them.

Friedland, who was born in a displaced persons camp, said she and her husband, Allan, and their family had decided the conference was the best way to build a bridge to the future.

"Allan spent years in Siberia, and his father walked miles every day to try and get antibiotics to keep him alive. My mother was a graduate of eight concentration camps."

Canada owes a debt of thanks to survivors who came here 50 years ago and helped to build the country, said Leipciger, chair of the Canadian Jewish Congress Holocaust remembrance committee.

On a March of the Living trip, he said he learned that survivor grandparents have a way of communicating with their grandchildren that works better if parents do not interfere.

He admitted that as a survivor, he had trouble telling his own children about the Holocaust. "There always seemed other things to talk about."

Life with survivor parents is not easy, said Dr. Robert Krell of Vancouver, who was hidden with a Catholic family in Holland for two years as a child.

"When my parents got me back, life had changed for them. They had lost parents and siblings. The 20,000 Jews in Holland had been reduced to 1,000."

A child psychiatrist who is now director of the British Columbia child psychology clinic, Krell said, "We felt we had to report only good news to our parents. Life was not easy."

He said his father, who died in 1995, had not set foot in a Jewish cemetery for 47 years, but finally did so before he died.

During the question period, a man asked what he could do to help his survivor father, who is suffering from dementia. "You don't have to go as far as dementia," Krell responded. "In post-operative anesthesia, doctors and nurses have been called Gestapo. It just takes memory plus a trigger."

To underline his point, he told of a group of aging survivors in British Columbia who had "dissolved in tears" after being unable to reach an agreement on the NATO bombings of Yugoslavia. "This situation is not genocide. But what they saw was parents being separated from children, and this triggered their memories."

A child survivor, and head of AMCHA in Israel, Dr. Natan Kellerman said there are unresolved difficulties between survivor parents and their children. "Hope can be life affirming, but it is a burden to carry if it is linked to a legacy of the Holocaust."

A third generation survivor, Tamara Steiber, granddaughter of Robert and Margo Engel, said she walked recently in High Park with Rwandan families to raise money for refugees.

Active in Holocaust education, she said she did not understand her parents until she had visited the sites of former concentration camps in Europe. "The predicament of the third generation became clear from Treblinka," she said.

Baycrest staffer Paula David, coordinator of the conference, said survivors have become experts in genocide. "They have seen the worst. They are in a position to talk to Rwandans and Kosovars."

A group of survivors at Baycrest Terrace were so moved by the stories of Kosovar refugees that they contributed $100 in toonies in a jam jar, she said.

The program began with an performance by Interlink, an intergenerational choir made up of 18 children from grades 4 and 5, and 21 adults from the Wagman Centre.

Co-chair Anita Ekstein said delegates from Israel, France and Sweden were among those attending. Co-chair Eva Doji presented the panelists and moderator with copies of a book of poetry written by Baycrest residents.

Gabi Garzon: a Hero by Design

Shot out of the sky over the Golan Heights during the Yom Kippur War, Gabi Garzon's Skyhawk fighter jet disintegrated beneath him.

Although Gabi survived the crash, once on land, he was taken prisoner by the Syrian Army.

Enduring seven and a half months of torture, with little or no medical attention, Gabi lost his leg at the hands of his captors.

Trained as an architect, Gabi's love of flying soon took hold of his design energies. Needing four limbs to fly an airplane, Gabi rose to the task of developing a prostheses specifically designed to allow him to properly manipulate the complicated foot controls found in fighter jets.

With the help of the IDF, Beit Halochem and Gabi's steely determination, Gabi Garzon can boast that he is the only qualified, one-legged fighter pilot in the world.

'We have to grasp the reins of our own destiny'

By RABBI MARVIN PACHINO
Special to The CJN

The issue of government funding for Jewish schools in Ontario is of critical import for the Jewish community, yet it has never been openly debated.

Opinion

One of my objectives in writing to express misgivings with regard to our community's preoccupation with obtaining government funds (CJN, Feb 11) was to open a discussion on the issue. I was, therefore, very pleased that Keith Landy and Joseph Steiner took the time to respond on behalf of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

As with any major issue, there will be differing opinions and members of the community will take opposing positions. This is as it should be, and an opportunity must be afforded for an airing of those differences. There is no better vehicle for promoting public discussion of issues within our community than The Canadian Jewish News.

While I may not succeed in persuading Landy and Steiner to change their views, several points which they made in their article ("The Jewish Education System," CJN, March 4) call for a reply and an elaboration.

Yes, I remain concerned that if the provincial government ever does extend funding to our schools they might also withdraw those funds in the future. In that case, the Jewish community would be hard-pressed to pick up the shortfall. I would concede, as Landy and Steiner contend, that it is not likely that the entire funding package would be cancelled, but government cuts to the overall education budget from year to year would, necessarily, have a negative impact upon the fiscal stability of the Jewish school system.

What funding mechanism would UJA Federation have in place to compensate for, say, a five percent reduction in funding one year, four percent the next year, six percent in the year following that? It is completely realistic to anticipate these sorts of reductions, given what has been happening in the public sector over the last several years.

How would our schools be expected to cope with such a reality? As the public schools do, by eliminating or cutting back programs and services, and by increasing class sizes? What would the community's contingency plan be for such situations, which are bound to arise? The fact that the community is requesting funding only for the general studies curricula does not mitigate the potential havoc.

We in the Toronto Jewish community are well aware of the staggering blow experienced by certain Jewish schools a few years ago when the very generous support of a single benefactor was withdrawn. Those schools have yet to recover, and teachers' salaries and bills from a variety of creditors are still not being paid on time.

Have UJA Federation and Congress given any thought to how they would respond under such circumstances?

According to Landy and Steiner, my opposition to seeking or accepting government funds for our day schools reflects "a sad lack of sensitivity towards the parents" who are committed to Jewish education. A re-reading of my article will reveal that I did take note of the financial desperation of parents, and of the fact that many middle-class families have been precluded from sending their children to day schools. This has troubled me for many years.

Local federation quite generous

If I required sensitivity training on the subject, I have received it from my own children, who are struggling to cope with the financial strain of sending their children to day schools, albeit in the United States. And here I must set the record straight for Landy and Steiner, who stated, "Even in the United States where Rabbi Pachino maintains that no Jewish school receives government funds, the fact of the matter is quite different. Grants for transportation, school books and health support services are available to all children in all U.S. schools."

This is simply not true.

Some school districts and jurisdictions in the United States do provide transportation, some provide text books, some provide special education services, and some provide specific health services to day school students. Some provide a combination of one or more of the above, while some provide absolutely nothing. It is far from universal, and where these services are provided, they are administered as direct benefits to the individual taxpayers within the district.

The schools do not receive a penny; consequently, there is utterly no salutary impact on tuition fees, which are borne in their entirety by the parents there, just as they are in Toronto.

Moving on to the role played by UJA Federation vis a vis the funding of Jewish education, I would certainly not want to "leave the impression" that it is either "meagre or non-existent." There is no question that our local federation has been quite generous in designating over 50 percent of its local allocations to Jewish education. These are big dollars!

However, no one knows better than Landy and Steiner that the funds allocated by UJA Federation, together with tuitions and separate fundraising efforts of the respective schools, are not adequate to meet the needs of a growing and dynamic school system.

Funds are not there, for example, for major curriculum development initiatives that are needed in Judaic studies, or for informal educational activities, or for family education programs that are crucial for the inculcation of Jewish values and a Jewish lifestyle.

Regular in-service programs for principals and teachers to upgrade knowledge and skills are not available to the professional staffs of our schools.

For a school system as large as ours, precious little is being done on a system-wide basis in the realm of special education, although some schools have been working independently to address the challenge. Some 15 to 20 percent of the total population has special education needs. That translates into close to 2,000 students in a system of our size, and the allocations from UJA Federation are insufficient to provide the required services. As a result, many students who require special education do not receive it and are forced to leave the Jewish school system.

These are but some examples of educational needs for which UJA Federation cannot presently provide. However, most telling, I believe, is the statistic that Landy and Steiner cited in their article. Of "almost 11,000 students, almost 3,000 are subsidized by the community." While this is certainly commendable, it means that approximately 72 percent of our parents are paying full fee!

I find it difficult to believe that 72 percent of the Jewish families in Toronto are capable of paying full tuition for two or three, and in some cases, four or more children.

What this statistic reveals is that the more well-to-do and the less well-to-do are sending their children to Jewish day schools. The vast middle is woefully under-represented, and not enough is being done to address this serious discrepancy.

Over the last decade, funding formulae for the schools have been juggled, caps have been imposed on tuition subsidies, and the family fee guidelines have not been brought up to date. The latter are ancient and painfully unrealistic.

Frankly, I am not quite so sanguine about the prospect of government funding alleviating the situation, because, while I hope I am wrong, there is every reason to believe that the federation is expecting to be able to reduce its allocation to Jewish education when and if the province agrees to fund our schools.

In the meantime, though, the province has not offered funding, and the Supreme Court has ruled that it is not required to do so.

In a paragraph that was edited out of my original article, I recall having stated that the Supreme Court had handed down its decision that our community had waged a good fight, but it lost. We should have acknowledged the loss then and drawn the correct conclusions. We should not have allowed the obsession with government funding to continue to paralyze our creative and innovative talents and forestall the establishment of an appropriate and adequate funding apparatus for day school education. There are needs that just cannot be met by the regular UJA campaign.

That is why I suggested that the Chicago community initiative should be looked at as a model for instituting the kind of Jewish education endowment fund that will be able to sustain our system well into the future. I am not necessarily expecting that we will be able to provide free schooling for every day school student, although that would be wonderful. Neither do I hold a brief for the Chicago model intact. But why are we not mobilizing our community on a grander scale on behalf of Jewish education?

Again I say, if we believe in the paramount importance of Jewish education and the need to make it accessible to every Jewish child, we have to grasp the reins of our own destiny. Others cannot, and never will, do it for us. The answer lies within our community.

Education funding rally draws over 3,000

that everybody else gets for free... There must be fair funding for everyone, not just a few people ... It's time for the status quo to end."

Liberal MPP Monte Kwinter, who sponsored the rally, said the government was "hiding behind the Supreme Court of Canada decision" rejecting a Charter challenge that would have compelled the government to fund independent schools on par with Catholic ones.

While the High Court's decision did not require government funding, it also didn't prevent it, he said.

The Queen's Park rally coincided with the release of the Ontario budget and was held in advance of the election call the next day. The rally was scheduled well before anyone knew when the budget would be released, Van Beveren said.

PEC is still developing a campaign strategy, though it's likely to include sponsoring all-candidates meetings on the issue, as well as urging supporters to question candidates about their views, she said.

Levin said petitions containing 15,000 signatures calling for fair funding have been submitted to Queen's Park. PEC is contemplating other initiatives, he added.

Representatives of Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada also attended last week's rally. Keith Landy, chair of Congress' Ontario region, said the rally "is a step in the process of having the government live up to its statements on fair funding."

He said the Congress committee on independent school funding, OJAEE, has met with representatives of the ministries of Education and Community and Social Services to discuss the provision of health services in Jewish schools. A meeting with the Ministry of Health is also planned, he said.

Tuition for children attending Jewish day schools ranges from $6,000 to over $12,000. With more than 11,000 children in the day school system, the cost to the community is conservatively estimated at more than $70 million a year – $20 million more than the UJA raises in its annual fundraising campaign, Levin said.

The rally had a geographically diverse representation to go along with its religious diversity. Christian students were bused in from Oshawa, Ancaster, Trenton, Stoney Creek and Smithville, Van Beveren said. Students from some 20 Jewish day schools in Toronto were bused to the rally, including United Synagogue Day School, Bais Yaakov, Netivot Hatorah, Eitz Chaim, Toronto Heschel School, Or Haemet, She'arim, Yesodei Hatorah and Yeshiva Gedolah.

About 30 to 40 high school students from CHAT attended, though the school did not bus students in, said CHAT headmaster Paul Shaviv.

The school's policy was to provide a mailing to parents informing them of the event and to permit students to attend the rally if they had their parent's permission, he said.

"Unfortunately, the school felt it was unable to bus children to the rally. We wish the rally every success and are fully in support of the aims of the organizers," Shaviv said.

"On future occasions, with adequate prior consultation, we will be happy to see if we can continue to support their [PEC's] activities," he added.

Uri Korin, principle at Bialik, said the school did not bus students to the rally, "but parents were encouraged to attend. We had a very good representation" at the rally, he said.

"We are very much in favor of government funding for Jewish schools... We felt that funding is an issue that has to be dealt with between the government, the Jewish education system and the parents. The parents are those who pay, and I did not see the merit of sending children to a political rally where they have no say in it.

"We felt that the merit of a lot of people there without children is 10 times greater," he added. "For kids to be involved in the dispute of adults is taking advantage of their innocence."

UJA Federation urging groups to sponsor Albanian refugees

TORONTO — UJA Federation is urging Toronto Jewish organizations to sponsor ethnic Albanian refugees coming to Canada.

Congregations and community groups are being asked to contact Jewish Immigrant Aid Service (JIAS), a beneficiary agency of UJA Federation, for information and guidance on the process.

JIAS is part of a coalition of Canadian faith groups helping the federal government with refugee absorption.

The most pressing needs are for housing, medical care, schools and language, said Jack Kugelmass, director of Toronto JIAS. Kugelmass cautioned organizations to contact JIAS before committing to sponsorship.

"There are a lot of well-intentioned people who may get in over their heads," he said. "Although sponsorship is rewarding, the burden can be quite intense."

Sponsoring groups are expected to support a family for one year, providing housing, clothing, money and all personal needs until they are ready to work.

The JIAS effort is being assisted by former Bosnian refugees, whom JIAS resettled in Canada during the war in Bosnia.

עברית קשה שפה (חלק א'):

Filmmaker describes experience in Albania

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Filmmaker/photographer Dan Carmi captured scenes of anguish and misery among Kosovo refugees who have fled to Albania.

TORONTO — Around the time Yugoslavs in Belgrade were holding outdoor rock concerts to express their defiance of NATO, 50,000 Israelis were gathering in Tel Aviv for a rock concert of their own.

The Israelis had gathered to raise funds to help the thousands of ethnic Albanians who had been forced out of their homes in Kosovo and turned into refugees.

Altogether, Israelis – including those at the rock concert – have raised $1.3 million (US) to help finance nine planeloads of supplies sent to ameliorate the situation facing Kosovo refugees, said Dan Carmi, a documentary filmmaker who recently returned from Albania.

Carmi was in Toronto last week, where he met with religious leaders, former Yugoslav Jews and members of the Jewish community to describe his experience with Israeli relief workers during 10 days in Albania.

Sometime towards the end of Pesach (late April), Carmi accompanied the first planeload of Israeli supplies to Tirana, the Albanian capital. He had been hired by the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) to document the relief effort the organization was undertaking for Kosovo refugees. Funds raised by Israelis and Jewish communities across the Diaspora – including Toronto – have been transferred to JAFI for the relief effort. About $50,000 raised by Toronto's UJA Federation has been sent, or will be sent to JAFI, according to UJA Federation spokesperson Elaine Fogel.

A veteran filmmaker who has shot documentaries in Chechnya, Romania, Ukraine and most recently, Samarkand, Carmi previewed his rough, uncut video from Albania as well as dozens of still photographs.

From the moment the Israeli plane touched down in Tirana airport, "it was a feeling of chaos," Carmi said. Aircraft from all over the world crowd the tarmac, and confusion was everywhere.

As each planeload of supplies arrived in Tirana from Israel, they were immediately loaded onto trucks for the journey to the camp. The Israelis wanted to avoid stockpiling the supplies in airport warehouses that were known as a prime target for Albanian mafia and other black marketeers. More than 120 tons of supplies have been airlifted from Israel to Albania, so far.

En route to the camp, Albanian truckdrivers who were hired to ferry the supplies, often "blackmailed" the Israelis for more money, which was forked over in American dollars, Carmi said.

The drive to the camp took about three hours – owing in large part to the poor quality of Albanian roads.

"The landscape is beautiful, but it doesn't take long until reality hits you," Carmi said.

At the camp, Carmi filmed a recent arrival, who told the Israelis in broken German how he witnessed "130 people, men women and children, being shot. Anything that moved, the [uniformed members of the Yugoslav army] shot," Carmi said.

Another scene shows a woman fleeing the camera after hearing for the first time that her grandfather had been killed.

The camp – a former chicken farm in Fierre – was a scene of chaos and confusion. Refugees were forced to sleep inside a former coop, in appalling conditions. About 200 people were scattered across the coop's floor in haphazard fashion and the stench emanating from within was terrible, Carmi said.

The camp had no running water and no sanitary facilities. Understandably, the refugees were glad to receive the Israeli supplies, the first to reach the camp.

They unloaded crates of bottled water, foam mattresses, blankets, baby food, diapers, powdered milk, soap, tents, clothing and even one ton of chocolate. The young people even made use of the empty supply boxes, Carmi said.

In addition to the Toronto UJA Federation's Kosovo relief fund, close to $35,000 has been raised in a similar fund by Canadian Jewish Congress.

Congress has not yet allocated the funds. "We are looking for a place where it will be most effective," said Jack Silverstone, the organization's national executive director.

Israeli, PA policies seen as hurting Palestinians

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —The Palestinians' nascent economy in the autonomous areas is being strangled by the double whammy of Palestinian and Israeli policies, says a Canadian analyst who has studied Middle East economies.

As a result, the Palestinian standard of living has decreased noticeably since the signing of the first Oslo agreement, the Declaration of Principles in September 1993.

"In the past two years, for example, the Palestinian real per capita gross domestic product has declined by an annual rate of almost four percent, and unemployment has approached 30 percent," said Randal Slavens.

"These developments have occurred despite the injection of international assistance into Palestinian development projects and government institutions," he added.

Slavens, a consultant with the Tel Aviv-based Info-Prod Research (Middle East) Ltd., blames the Palestinian Authority (PA) and the Israeli government for strangling the Palestinian economy and preventing it from achieving "reasonable levels of growth."

The PA, he said, is riddled with corruption and weighed down by an inflated bureaucracy and an insufficient infrastructure.

And, he charged, the PA does not encourage joint ventures with Israel.

But Slavens said that Israel's closure policy, as well as its control of Palestinian trade, is also damaging the PA's economy.

A 25-year-old Torontonian, he received a master's degree from Carleton University's Norman Patterson School of International Affairs last year. He wrote his thesis on regional economic cooperation in the Middle East.

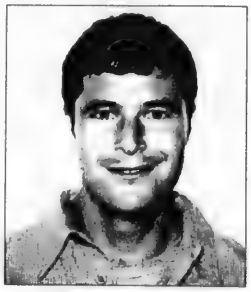
Since then, he has worked for Info-Prod, an Israeli company with an office in Jordan, which specializes in market research and matching up businesses with investment opportunities in the area.

Slavens said that the PA has not permitted even a single significant joint venture with an Israeli firm, despite the fact that Israeli businesses have shown enthusiasm for investing in the Palestinian self-rule areas.

The PA, he pointed out, permits joint ventures only with Israeli monopolies such as Nesher, the cement manufacturer.

"This policy causes potential foreign investors to question the PA's interest in positive economic relations with Israel, and in creating a vibrant private sector and a market economy. It also discourages local Palestinian business leaders."

By contrast, Jordan encourages Jordanian-Israeli joint ventures. "The Jordanian leadership, even during precarious political periods, has given its business leaders a clear signal to differentiate between the political and economic spheres."



Randal Slavens

Asked to explain the rationale behind the PA's policy, Slavens said that the PA fears Israeli economic domination.

As well, he noted, the PA wants to develop an economy independent of Israel.

For these reasons, the PA and some Palestinian think tanks oppose a customs union with Israel. But from a purely economic standpoint the Palestinians would benefit from the establishment of a free trade zone encompassing Israel and PA territory.

Turning to a related topic, Slavens said that even Palestinian investors have become disgruntled with the level of corruption within the PA.

And, he pointed out, a law passed by the PA to encourage investment, mixes politics with economics and thus has the opposite effect.

In addition, wages, rents and production costs are far higher in the PA than in Jordan. Both, he said, compete for foreign investment and trade.

Yet Israel is hardly blameless for the parlous state of economic development in the PA, he said.

In the aftermath of the 1995-96 series of suicide bombings in Israel, the Israeli government closed its borders with the PA in an effort to stop more Palestinian bombers from entering Israel.

Closures have cost the PA dearly. They have increased the unemployment rate in the West Bank to about 30 percent and in the Gaza Strip to some 50 percent. In the early 1990s, an average of 120,000 Palestinian laborers worked in Israel, compared to 50,000 to 60,000 today.

But certain developments, including an influx of foreign workers, large-scale Russian immigration and a recession in the construction sector, have also sharply reduced the demand for Palestinian workers.

According to Slavens, closures have deprived the Palestinian economy of $2.5 million to $7 million a day.

Slavens said that Israel has "used and abused" security considerations to hurt the Palestinian economy, particularly in delaying the shipment of highly perishable agricultural produce.

A lot of PA- manufactured products do not meet Israeli quality-control standards; Israel has used this as an excuse to keep Palestinian goods out of Israel, he said.

In his view, the Arab world will never replace Europe as one of Israel's chief export markets. At present, less than one percent of Israeli exports flow into Egypt and Jordan, the only two Arab countries officially at peace with Israel.

He estimates that Israel's clandestine trade with the Arab world ranges from $400 million to $1 billion per annum.

Slavens, a 1991 graduate of the Community Hebrew Academy, was drawn to the study of Middle East economies by two influences: a one year exchange program at the Hebrew University in 1994-95, and Shimon Peres' vision of a New Middle East consisting of a regional community of nations with a common market and elected centralized parliamentary bodies.

A former research assistant with the Canada-Israel Committee, he is the son of Eric and Marsha Slavens.

Coast to Coast

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

As sure as the May tulips begin to blossom in Ottawa, springtime heralds the commencement of "shuffle fever." Speculation about changes in the composition of the federal Cabinet switch into overdrive, and one can find more betting pools on who is in and who is out than on the favorites to win the Stanley Cup.

This year, however, the rumor mill is super-heated with thoughts about the prime minister's personal plans. In truth, only two people can know for certain what lies ahead for Jean Chrétien's immediate future – Chrétien himself, of course, and his closest advisor, his wife Aline.

Whether he heads for the 19th green now or 12 months hence, there will be a leadership race in the coming year. Its timing will have an impact on the candidates aspiring to succeed him, and that in turn will have some important impacts on the Jewish community.

By everyone's admission, Paul Martin is the leading contender to become the next leader of the Liberal party and prime minister of Canada. But the longer Chrétien holds on, the greater will be the challenge for Martin to "win easy." And that's the conundrum for the Jews.

So long as Paul Martin is seen as a shoo-in, the pressure on certain Jews to place their money and support behind other candidates will be minimal. If, however, the playing field is levelled, ambitious pretenders to the throne will have certain expectations of support.

In previous leadership races, certain politicians felt more than a bit slighted when that support was not forthcoming. Despite objective assessments that their candidacies were doomed, they attributed lackluster performances or aborted leadership bids to the failure by key constituencies – including the Jewish community – to stand with them.

Politicians have awfully long memories and nothing colors their attitudes quite like the resentment of having been rebuffed. At best, it's a case of "dancing with the one who brung you." At worst, it's nothing short of implicit political extortion.

For key figures in the Jewish community, the choice will be between hedging their bets, spreading their support around, or letting it all ride on one candidate, praying he or she wins big enough to offset any perceived snub by the wannabe leaders.

Their decision may be even tougher than the one facing Jean Chrétien.

Bonds set to honor mother, daughter

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — State of Israel Bonds is bestowing awards on both a mother and a daughter on May 13.

Winnipeg philanthropist Marion Vickar is the recipient of the Deborah Award. The organization will also be recognizing her daughter, Elaine Scharfe of Saskatoon, with the "Golda Meir brooch" as a second generation M'dor L'dor.

Vickar and her husband, Ed, have been honored by Israel Bonds and other Jewish organizations previously for their generosity. A few years ago, they purchased $1 million worth of Israel Bonds, which they contributed toward the creation of the Marion and Ed Vickar Jewish Museum of Western Canada at the Asper Jewish Community Campus.

The Vickars have been longtime supporters of many organizations, among them Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, the Jewish National Fund, Israel Bonds and the local community.

Scharfe, who grew up in Melfort, Sask., says she learned everything about tzedakah from her parents. She and her husband Sherwood lived in Winnipeg during the early years of their marriage, moving to Saskatoon in 1969 where Sherwood opened his own General Motors dealership.

The Scharfes have four children and nine grandchildren. Their daughters live in Saskatoon and Toronto, their sons in Australia and Israel. "Raising my children is the most important thing I have done," says the Israel Bonds honoree.

Prof. draws fire for views on anti-homophobia education

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Dr. Hymie Rubenstein, a University of Manitoba anthropology professor, is being targeted by hate mail on the Internet because of a public stand he has taken against a proposal to introduce anti-homophobia education in Winnipeg schools.

This stance has also made Rubenstein the subject of a complaint to the university administration by the University of Manitoba Students Union (UMSU), which has charged Rubenstein with violating human rights standards on discrimination.

Rubenstein's problems stem from a Winnipeg School Division meeting on April 13, where he distributed 200 copies of a pamphlet he prepared contrasting what he described as "homosexual myths" and reality.

Claiming that there is no credible scientific evidence, he rejects the commonly held view that homosexuality is genetically acquired. He also says the percentage of committed homosexuals and bisexuals in society is overstated.

Following this meeting, the students union launched the human rights complaints charging that Rubenstein's pamphlet is "hate literature."

Speaking for the union, the communications director, Kelly Friesen, says the UMSU felt that Rubenstein's comments were "inappropriate. We represent all the students on campus, including gay students.

"In doing research on the Internet, I found that most American Psychiatric Association members believe that homosexuality is biologically-based.

"We are most concerned that Dr. Rubenstein is presenting his own subjective opinions as fact and that because he has a PhD and is a professor, people will take his views as facts."

Rubenstein's response has been to come out fighting. "At university, we are supposed to be teaching students to be open-minded and tolerant of different points of view," he says.

"Instead the students union is trying to stifle dissent. I have a growing contempt for political correctness. I despise the term inclusiveness. It has come to represent a misappropriation and gross distortion of such basic social science concepts as norms, values, ideals, cultural relativism and ethnocentrism."

The son of Russian Jewish immigrants, Rubenstein grew up in Toronto's Kensington Market area. Although proud of his Jewish heritage, he proclaims himself an atheist.

"I believe in ecumenicalism and tolerance and respect for everyone," he says.

Although he says he sympathizes with the religious perspective on homosexuality, he approaches the issue from an academic point of view. One of Rubenstein's specialities is the study of human sexuality in its different forms in different societies.

He jumped into the Winnipeg school debate because, he says, he recognizes that there is a "radical homosexual agenda" in North America aimed at making homosexuality acceptable as a normal form of sexual activity. That is a view that he strongly disagrees with.

The University's response to the students' complaint about Rubenstein has been that his views were expressed outside of his work and therefore are not within the university's jurisdiction. The professor has mixed feelings about his employer's response.

Although he appreciates the quick decision, he says he is disappointed that the president and board of the university didn't publically support his right to freely express his views.

"The university response implies that I am being let off on a technicality. "The president should have defended my academic freedom. Instead, I am left under a cloud of doubt."

Israeli police and other security services are worried that an attempt to shut down the offices against the will of the Palestinians may generate rioting and bloodshed.

Kahalani himself came under attack at the inner cabinet meeting. Some ministers accused Kahalani of adopting deliberate foot-dragging tactics over the issue in order to keep his name in the headlines and win support for his Third Way party, which is foundering in the election polls.

With Jerusalem Day on this week, and the Knesset elections next Monday, the Orient House issue has become a hot issue.

Earlier in the day on Sunday, the inner cabinet had decided to implement the closure order for the three offices – one of them run by Faisal Husseini, minister for Jerusalem affairs in the Palestinian Authority – that were issued about two weeks ago. The government claims that the offices are working for the PA and that this is illegal under the terms of the Oslo Accords.

As of late Sunday, Husseini was still talking optimistically about a possible compromise that would leave the three offices in the building open.

As understood by Orient House officials, some of the offices' activity would be moved elsewhere – presumably to the east Jerusalem suburb of Abu Dis – if they were found to conflict with the original mandate the Palestine Liberation Organization had been given to operate in the building. The Palestinians maintain that this mandate dates back to the period of the Madrid Conference in 1991.

However, the Israeli proposal stipulated that Husseini's office could remain in the building but not conduct political activity or receive ministerial or diplomatic missions. The other two offices (a centre for geographical studies and a foreign relations bureau) would be moved to Ramallah in the West Bank.

As soon as Husseini received this formulation, he urgently convened representatives of the different Palestinian groups in Jerusalem and some public figures, and they decided unanimously to reject the Israeli proposal.

"The message of the Israeli proposal is clear: They want the Orient House closed down. Our message is equally clear: We are ready for a confrontation," one of the participants in the meeting said.

Husseini, in the meantime, received British, French and Swedish consuls at the Orient House, and then left to meet with the American consul general in Jerusalem.

Leaflets target Moscow mayor

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — Anti-Semitic leaflets aimed against the mayor of Moscow are being distributed in two Russian cities.

The leaflets have been distributed in at least two locations, according to media reports. Earlier this year, some Moscow residents found them stuffed in their mailboxes. This month, residents of Kirov, located 500 miles east of Moscow, found similar leaflets in their mail.

The leaflets use a photo of Luzhkov and Russian Jewish Congress President Vladimir Goussinsky – both sporting skullcaps – taken last September at the opening of the Holocaust Memorial Synagogue inside Moscow's World War II memorial park. The picture taken at the ceremony, also attended by Russian President Boris Yeltsin, was originally published in a Moscow daily.

Luzhkov, who is known to be a close friend of Goussinsky, has won a reputation among Russian Jews for his support of the Jewish community. The leaflets cite several quotes from Luzhkov speaking favorably about Jews.

The leaflets also assert that Moscow mayor's "original" last name is Katz, adding in large print, "And this man wants to become president of Russia!"

Over the past decade, various anti-Semitic and anti-Communist groups have tried to ascribe Jewish roots to several post-Soviet leaders and even to such Soviet figures as Leonid Brezhnev.

The leaflet generated front-page reports in the Moscow press.

Izvestia, a leading daily, described the use of ethnicity as an "alarming feature of the national election campaign."

There are no Jews among likely contenders for the Kremlin seat.

"In the absence of real Jews in the race, you can fight against fake Jewish candidates," says Moscow Chief Rabbi Pinchas Goldschmidt.

"The trend has become obvious in the [Russian] political landscape."

In a separate development, dozens of anti-Semitic stickers were posted last week in several Moscow subway stations.

Also, a few dozen men clad in military-style black uniforms and bearing anti-Semitic banners walked in downtown Moscow on Sunday as part of a counter-demonstration to a rally that marked the Soviet Union's defeat of Nazi Germany in World War II.

Toll free telephone service

In November of 1998, Canada's life and health insurers announced the creation of a dedicated, toll-free telephone information service, in both English and French, to assist anyone seeking information on possible unclaimed insurance proceeds owing to victims, and survivors of the Holocaust and their heirs.

This service is being offered through the Consumer Assistance Centre of the Canadian Life and Health Insurance Association, which for more than 25 years has responded to life and health insurance enquiries, including requests for policy searches.

Although Canadian life insurance companies did not operate in continental Europe between the years 1930 and 1945, it is possible that Canadian insurers operating in other countries, such as the United Kingdom for example, could have sold policies insuring people who subsequently became victims of the Holocaust.

Since November of last year, the service has received 140 calls, the vast majority from people seeking information about possible lost insurance proceeds. None of the calls related to a Canadian life insurer, and they were therefore referred to the U.S.-based Holocaust Claims Processing Office (HCPO) which has been set up to assist the heirs of Holocaust victims and Holocaust survivors locate possible unclaimed insurance policies on a worldwide basis.

Since the Canadian service has been able to provide some assistance to callers by putting them in touch with the appropriate organizations, the life and health insurance industry wanted to ensure awareness of its existence through this second round of notices in the Jewish community press across Canada.

The service is staffed by knowledgeable industry retirees who will make every effort to be of assistance. They can be reached at the numbers shown below, from 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. Eastern Time, Monday through Friday. After these hours, it is possible to leave a message which will be answered promptly the next business day.

Researchers to study unconventional Jewish identity

By JULIA GOLDMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Lighting Shabbat candles is a traditional symbol of Jewish identity. But watching a Jewish film festival?

Researchers working on the year 2000 National Jewish Population Survey are looking into unconventional Jewish activity – such as joining Jewish book clubs or attending museum exhibitions – alongside more standard measures of observance and affiliation to gauge what contributes to Americans' sense of Jewish identity.

The Canadian Jewish community will not be included in the survey. A separate census will be conducted for the community in Canada.

This new line of questioning is the result of findings from the last nationwide Jewish population survey in 1990, which showed American Jews moving away from Jewish ritual and membership in synagogues and Jewish organizations.

"There are many forms of being Jewish," Alice Goldstein, a member of the new survey's advisory committee, said in a telephone interview.

"We didn't have a handle on that" in the 1990 survey.

The 2000 survey is being designed to build on the demographic information collected a decade ago, and then to probe deeper into the ways Jewish identity is formed and maintained in American society.

The 1990 survey, sponsored by the Council of Jewish Federations (CJF), sent shockwaves through the Jewish community with its report of a 52 percent Jewish intermarriage rate. As a result of that finding, the organized Jewish community refocused its agenda on examining and promoting Jewish continuity.

Organized by the United Jewish Communities (UJC) – the new national entity formed by the merger of CJF, the United Jewish Appeal and the United Israel Appeal – next year's survey will canvas 5,000 households selected through hundreds of thousands of random phone calls.

With twice the budget and a survey sample twice the size of 1990's, the 2000 survey is planned to be "the most comprehensive, socially graphic portrait ever done of the American Jewish community," said Jim Schwartz, director of the UJC's research department.

The $4 million survey and subsequent studies are being funded largely by private donors, with local federations contributing about $1.7 million.

As with the results of the 1990 survey, Schwartz said, the 2000 findings will be used to help determine communal needs, fundraising strategies and funding allocations, and for followup research.

Next year's survey will be translated into Russian and Yiddish for better coverage of new immigrants and other communities that might otherwise be left out.

The increased number of respondents will allow for more in-depth analyses of responses, particularly in the areas of Jewish education and philanthropic trends, organizers say.

Thus, in a current draft, questions on religious upbringing can be compared to current denominational affiliation and synagogue membership to help draw a "wonderful portrait of denominational mobility," Schwartz said.

A detailed section on charitable giving is now augmented with numerous questions about volunteerism for Jewish and secular causes. It may also ask whether respondents prefer giving to umbrella organizations, such as the United Way or Jewish federations, or to individual charities.

Next to questions about religious observance and theological beliefs, are inquiries into Jewish cultural activities and spirituality: "Do you say any prayers in your own words?" "In the past year have you used the Internet or e-mail to learn about Jewish topics?"

Whereas the 1990 survey asked respondents' levels of Jewish education and that of their children, this time around they will be asked to evaluate the quality of those programs.

Respondents will also be asked about summer camp experiences and the frequency and quality of Israel trips, as well as the sponsoring organizations.

Sections dealing specifically with social activism and perceptions of anti-Semitism have been pared down.

Still, many questions will be repeated from 1990 so trends can be charted over the past decade.

The last survey found "a clear drop" in the levels of organizational membership, volunteerism, synagogue membership and ritual observance "across the board," said Alice Goldstein.

The 1990 findings reverberated throughout UJA and CJF – American Jewry's most broad-based fundraising and social service organizations – even before their merger into the UJC.

Holocaust imagery misplaced: Cotler

Many Serbs, and not a few Jews, invoke images of Serbian-Jewish resistance to the Nazis in World War II, a symbolism inviting, if not justifying, a Serbian-Jewish front against NATO today.

If this were not enough, parallel images are invoked of Albanian "complicity" with the SS in the Holocaust, seeking to "Nazify" the Albanian Kosovars.

Similarly, many Albanians, and not a few Jews, hold out Albanian Kosovars as today's "Jews", victims of the Serbian "Nazis." If this were not enough, many Albanians, and not a few Jews, recall Albania saving "her Jews" in World War II while also invoking Serbian complicity with the Nazis.

It does not end there.

If the Holocaust is a metaphor to understand or manipulate the understanding of what is happening in Kosovo today, many commentators and critics, including not a few Israelis and Jews, invoke Kosovo as metaphor for the Holocaust.

For them, the desperate Kosovo refugee of 1999 evokes the fleeing Jewish refugee of World War II; shocking television footage of crowded trains of Kosovars in 1999 evoke grainy film images of train deportations to Auschwitz during the Holocaust. The coercive detention of Albanian Kosovars in 1999 is the cruel "selection" of Jews in the death camps of 1943.

The problem with all this, is that while Kosovo is a humanitarian tragedy, replete with criminal violations of human rights, it is not a Holocaust.

Kosovar refugees suffer terribly as refugees, but in the Holocaust, a refugee was a "privileged" status, a step ahead of death. In Kosovo, expulsions are to Albania or Macedonia; in the Holocaust the deportations were to planet Auschwitz.

Indeed, to suggest that Kosovo is another Holocaust, runs the risk of trivializing the Holocaust, while minimizing the evil of Kosovo. For if Kosovo is a Holocaust, then the Holocaust was like Kosovo, which means that in the Holocaust there were no gas chambers, no death camps, no "final solution" to kill every Jew anywhere simply because they were Jews.

Similarly, to require of Kosovo to be a Holocaust in order to characterize it as radical evil, is to deny its essential evil even when it is not a Holocaust. For while Kosovo is not a Holocaust, what is happening there – forced detentions, disappearances, expulsions, rape, murder – is evil enough.

Indeed, invoking the Holocaust to justify humanitarian intervention in Kosovo today, results more from a failure of memory than from a parallel analogy.

Bosnia, and not the Holocaust, is metaphor and message for Kosovo.

It was the criminal indifference and silence by NATO in Bosnia from 1991 to 1995 – and in Kosovo for a decade now – that allowed Milosovic to develop, refine, and perfect the policy and practice of murderous ethnic cleansing.

And so it was then, as NATO and the world watched and did nothing, that Serb troops under Milosevic's command during six weeks in the spring of 1992, "cleansed" more than 70 percent of Bosnian territory, and that Serbian Gen. Ratko Mladic, a CNN interviewee, in less than a week in July 1995, expelled some 25,000 women, children, and old people from Serbia and murdered some 7,000 men of "fighting age."

Remembrance and the reality of the Holocaust need not be diminished or distorted to justify interventions in Kosovo today.

The remembrance and reality of Bosnia, and the failure to indict Milosovic as a war criminal, are lesson enough.

Bridge victims vent pain

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Victims of the Maccabiah bridge collapse, and their families, vented their pain and anger during a unique satellite video conference recently that linked them with a Knesset subcommittee investigating the incident.

The words were harsh and the message blunt from Colin Elterman, whose daughter Sasha was among the dozens of Australian athletes injured when a footbridge across the polluted Yarkon River collapsed. Four members of the Australian delegation died in the incident.

Speaking in Sydney, Elterman said the pain and anger in the Australian community was due to the "stupidity and negligence that resulted in the disaster, but also because of the absolutely immoral and un-Jewish way in which the Maccabi World Union (MWU) leaders have acted in the 22 months since the disaster."

He argued the MWU must be completely overhauled, and he called for a comprehensive, independent investigation of the organization.

Elterman provided The CJN with a copy of his address to the committee as well as a news release outlining the views of the bridge disaster victims.

Lynn Zines, whose husband Warren died in the incident, was more circumspect in her choice of wording. Referring to the attitude of MWU officials in the wake of the disaster, she said, "Where we come from, we do not behave in this manner," the Jerusalem Post (JP) reported.

"I find it hard to adequately express the anger and distress that I deal with daily," she said. "I find it most distasteful that some 22 months after the tragedy, the president and chair of MWU are still holding their positions."

Peter Wertheim, vice-president of the Executive Council for Australian Jewry, said "all we got [from the MWU] was prevarication, an attempt to avoid responsibility, buck-passing, all depressingly familiar phenomenons of human nature, which we see whenever there has been a foul-up."

Others to address the Knesset subcommittee included Andrew Simons for the family of the late Yette Bennett, and Edgar Small, father of the late Greg Small. They called for the resignations of senior MWU officials Ronald Bakalarz and Uzi Netanel.

Amir Peled, a member of the executive of the Maccabiah movement, rejected suggestions the MWU was indifferent to the victims of the disaster. "Nothing has ever been taken so seriously, ever," the JP reported him saying. He said Bakalarz and Netanel would not step down, and he asserted they had the backing of international Maccabi organizations.

Roy Salomon, president of Maccabi Canada, has on numerous occasions come to the defence of the MWU organization, and rejected calls for its top officials to resign.

In other developments, Maccabi Australia (MA) recently adopted a resolution that called on Bakalarz and Netanel to "stand aside from their MWU positions until completion of the Knesset inquiry."

MA also resolved not to participate in any Maccabiah activity until minimum health and safety standards are met. Another resolution stated MA would not take part in Maccabiah activities until "there be an offer of compensation made to the victims by a court appointed mediator or judge...or there be an offer arising from negotiation."

The Australian Jewish News (AJN) recently reported that victims' families that wish to receive funds from the MWU can do so only by agreeing not to pursue other legal avenues against the organization. That condition was met with bitterness by victims' families and claims that such a condition would limit their rights, the AJN reported.

Following the bridge collapse MA president Tom Goldman secured an agreement with the Israeli government and MWU to loan the victims or their families $500,000, repayable upon compensation settlements. To date, only funds from the Israeli government have been distributed, though $125,000 of MWU loan funds sit untouched in an Australian bank account.

TORONTO AUTHOR WINS ORDER OF CANADA

Sheldon Godfrey, co-author with his wife Judith Godfrey of several books and scholarly articles on Canadian Jews, has been awarded the Order of Canada.

Godfrey, a lawyer, first received word that he had been chosen for the honor when he received a certificate last October. The official induction ceremony took place in Rideau Hall in Ottawa in April. Last week, the Godfreys celebrated the honor by holding an afternoon gathering in their home in midtown Toronto.

The Godfreys are authors of Search Out the Land: The Jews and the Growth of Equality in British Colonial America, 1740-1867. A previous book, Burn This Gossip, focused on the little-known personage of George Benjamin, the first Jewish MP in Canada.

Godfrey is active in matters concerning Canadian heritage, having restored several old and historically important buildings, including Canada's first post office and the oldest bank building in the country.

He and his wife are pillars of several historical and other societies, and have also become known for their various acts of philanthropy. In making the award, the government alluded to all of these accomplishments without singling out any of them in particular.

"It feels great," Godfrey said, on receiving the award. "It's a great honor, and it validates the various things I've been doing. People do things because they think they're important, not because they think they'll get recognized some day.

So it's great when your work does get recognized. Not only does it give you credibility, it gives you status – which is a tool to enable you to do more."

Yiddish music energizes Patinkin

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — No matter how many times he sings his Yiddish repertoire, it's hard for Mandy Patinkin to imagine growing tired of the songs.

"Whenever I'm away from them for any length of time and I come back to the music, either the Yiddish or the English, I feel like I get a transfusion. [It's] like I was anemic," he said last week, speaking on a cellphone from Los Angeles.

Torontonians will be able to get their own boost next week when Patinkin – who is also known for his work on Broadway and in films like Yentl and The Princess Bride – performs at the Hummingbird Centre on May 17. He will perform his English-language "pops" concert at Montreal's Place des Arts.

The concerts differ sartorially as well as musically. For the Yiddish concert, instead of his usual black T-shirt, loose black pants and gym shoes, Patinkin wears a tuxedo (albeit with a black T-shirt) and "grown-up" shoes.

He wanted the music to have "a formality and a respect," he explained.

Shortly after his Yiddish-language CD, Mamaloshen, was released last year, he told The CJN the album was "the only real professional goal that ever really mattered…I felt it was my duty to do my share in passing on my heritage."

Patinkin, 46, takes his work seriously, but not stodgily – as if the latter adverb could ever be applied to someone whose performing style is frequently described as over the top. Fanciful versions of The Hokey Pokey or Supercalifragilisticexpialidocious, in translation, provide a bracing counterpoint to poignant Yiddish standards like Belz and Papirosen. On stage, Paul Simon's American Tune links the diverse elements of the concert.

Recently, Patinkin has done some soul-searching, prompted by television news of events in Kosovo and the high school shooting in Colorado. "How do you entertain when this kind of thing is going on?" he asked.

He began to address the issue at his concerts, and by asking for contributions at his nine most recent performances, has raised about $120,000 for Doctors Without Borders and Pax, an organization dedicated to stricter gun control laws. "That gave me a reason to sing," he said.

In his upcoming Toronto concert, a portion of the tickets are being sold through Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University as a fundraiser.

Patinkin grew up in Chicago not knowing a word of Yiddish. But hearing popular American songs in his ancestors' tongue, as he puts it, has been a very moving experience. He finds the language "unbelievably rich and colorful."

His audience runs the gamut from Holocaust survivors to Japanese, African American, Hispanic and Irish Catholic. Because the songs reflect basic life experiences like death, love and survival, "this is everyone's story," he said.

The basic concert is entirely in Yiddish (sometimes, as in the upcoming Toronto performance, there is a separate portion of English songs), but a brief sentence projected in English conveys the essence of each Yiddish song.

A related upcoming project is a Mamaloshen book. Before tackling that, however, Patinkin will record a new, English-language album called Kidults, songs for children and "for the child in the adult."

And – undoubtedly to the delight of his fans – he is returning to the weekly television series Chicago Hope.

In fact, when he spoke to The CJN last week, he had just finished the day-long taping of the season finale.

It felt great to be back on the set, he enthused. He is reprising the role of the temperamental cardiologist Jeffrey Geiger, for which he won an Emmy, but only after being assured he would still have time to do concerts and "plenty of time" to spend with his family.

SACRED SITES FOR FIRST NATION TRIBES

As in Jewish history, the burial sites of patriarchs and matriarchs in North American aboriginal culture are sacred spots.

North American history is a relatively recent phenomenon when compared to the 5759-year-old Jewish calendar, but artifacts and excavations have illuminated details of an aboriginal prehistory that extends back several millenia.

Situated on a grassy knoll overlooking the north shore of Rice Lake, near Peterborough, Ont., are a series of eight ovoid mounds, each housing about 20 graves. Nearby is a larger serpentine mound that winds through the neighboring woods for some 60 metres, housing more than 100 graves.

These burial sites, known collectively as the Serpent Mounds, were left by a nation that archeologists call the Point Peninsula or Anishnaabeg People. They date from about 100 CE, almost contemporaneous to the destruction of the Jerusalem Temple, on the other side of the world.

Over the last century, three teams of scientists have excavated sections of the burial sites. The first recorded excavation was in 1895, the last around 1955. The finds associated with these digs have revealed significant details about the Anishnaabeg.

Most of those buried were not lying prone; rather, they were in a flexed position. Artifacts indicate that these people were connected to an extensive, continental trading network. Apparently, they returned to the site annually from approximately 128 to 400 CE, after which the site was abandoned. However, despite our scientific probes, these people remain a mystery.

Similar ovoid mounds are found in the Ohio Valley, but the serpentine mound is considered unique. Today this hallowed and protected spot lies within Serpent Mounds Park, a campground operated by the Hiawatha First Nation. For more information, phone 705-295-6879.

Deep within a forest northeast of Peterborough is an extraordinary collection of picture-words, called petroglyphs. Prehistoric Algonkians carved this assortment of shapes and figures on a slab of limestone between 500 and 1,000 years ago. Depicting turtles, snakes, humans and other beings and objects, the petroglyphs number about 900 and comprise one of the largest concentrations of aboriginal rock art in North America.

In a classic 1962 study, anthropologists Selwyn Dewdney and Kenneth Kidd noted that Ontario pictograph drawings generally lack studious detail, so that animal forms are often indistinguishable from each other, and humans and animals often show great distortion, often moving from realism into a fantastic world of dream images.

These images feature dragon-like beasts with antlers, human forms with fishtails, and other nameless hybrids. "To all appearances," write Dewdney and Kidd, "the aboriginal artist was groping toward the expression of the magical aspect of his life, rather than taking pleasure in the world of form around him. Essentially, however, the origin and purpose of these deceptively simple paintings remain a mystery."

Charles Kingam, a member of the Peterborough Historical Society, found the petroglyphs in 1924, but the discovery went unpublicized until 1954, when members of a geological team encountered them after sitting down on a rock to eat their lunch. Today the petroglyphs are protected beneath a glass enclosure in Petroglyphs Provincial Park.

The canoe was a vital implement of Native culture and an essential survival tool for early explorers and travellers in the Canadian wilderness.

Kirk Wipper, a retired Toronto-area university professor, devoted several decades to amassing more than 1,000 canoes, kayaks and similar vessels. The collection, considered the largest in the world, is the focus of a new Peterborough facility, the Canadian Canoe Museum, that is set to open on Canada Dav.

The Canadian Canoe Museum also includes an original trading post from Wawa. Phone 705-748-9153, web site, www.canoemuseum.net.

Festival featured eclectic fare

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

It's a wrap. The seventh annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival is over. From a viewer's point of view, it was a success because virtually all the movies were of high quality, and catered to eclectic tastes.

By way of illustrating this point, I will review six films which exhibited these qualities – two from Israel, one each from Sweden and Iceland, one from the United States and one from Russia.

Florentene, an Israeli TV drama set in a trendy, working class district in southern Tel Aviv in 1995, reminded me of the American sitcom Friends. Unfolding in six half-hour episodes, Florentene was generally hip and cool, focusing on twenty-something secular Israelis coping with their daily lives.

Rather than being a tiresome exercise in self-indullgent narcissism and frivolity, Florentene transcended itself by also examining serious socio-political issues – the integration of new Russian immigrants into Israeli society, homosexuality and Yitzhak Rabin's assassination.

Beyond all that, I liked its fresh, appealing and down-to-earth characters.

Shira, the bubbly host of a children's TV show, lives with Maor, a gardener whose clients include a wealthy, flirtatious older woman. Tomer, recently back from an extended trip to India, searches for meaning in life and love. Gali, a vivacious newspaper columnist, flits around like a butterfly. Tutti, virginal and vulnerable, finds a mature companion in Sasha, a soulful immigrant from Russia whose wife and daughter have yet to join him in Israel.

Directed by Eytan Fox, Florentene is quite explicit secually, far more so than the average Canadian or American television drama. This expresses itself in Tutti's brief relationship with Sasha, Tomer's dalliance with a painter, and Shira's impulsive encounter with a stranger.

Best of all, in the segments concerning Rabin's cold-blooded murder, Florentene has a knack for translating personal pain into national pain.

Kalinka Maya, a sweet confection from Israel, turns on two young Russian women, Irena and Natasha, and their Israeli suitors, Motti and Eran.

Eran, a macho man, invites his reticent friend, Motti, to join him on a night out in town. As the lustful bachelors cruise around Jerusalem, they stumble into Mea Shearim, the haredi enclave. It's a mistake, because the Sabbath has already started.

At last, they arrive at Irena's place. Eran and Irena are romantically involved, but Motti and Natasha do not know each other. As Eran and Irena make out in the kitchen, and then in the bedroom, Motti and Natasha struggle without much success to converse in English, their common language.

Natasha, who has no feelings for Israel, hardly appreciates Motti. And she is less than pleased when he makes a half-hearted pass at her. But soon enough, she loosens up, and he grows on her.

Kalinka Maya, written and directed by Eitan Londoner, is alternately droll and amusing. And as a portrait of cultural dysfunction in a country whose raison d'etre is immigrant absorption, it is quite effective.

Isaac Bashevis Singer "...About A Hidden God..." is an affectionate tribute to the late novelist and Nobel laureate.

Isy Morgensztern starts with a view of Singer in a plush chair, taking questions following a lecture. "Ask any question," he says teasingly. "I'll answer even if I don't know the answer." The audience bursts into laughter, thereby setting the mirthful tone of this enjoyable documentary.

It explores every facet of his personality: his childhood in Poland, his years in America, his philosophy, his beliefs and his relationships. It does so with the help of old file footage of pre-war Poland and of a youthful Singer. Better still, we're treated to narrated excerpts from his novels and short stories.

The man is revealed.

Stateless, Arrogant and Lunatic takes its title from a condescending comment made by a British diplomat about Gilel Storch, a Latvian Jew who tried to save Jews during the Holocaust. Lena Einhorn's film, excellent in every respect, is a profile of an unusual person and a black era. A highly creative mix of interviews, archival footage and re-enactments, it is vivid and riveting.

Storch arrived in Sweden in 1940 with a temporary business visa, leaving his family behind in Riga. Once he had brought them to Stockholm, he turned his attention to rescuing Latvian Jewry and, subsequently, European Jewry. In his attempt to achieve his objective, he initiated talks with none other than Heinrich Himmler, the diabolical SS leader.

Restless and driven, Storch is credited with saving 60,000 Jews, and with devising a plan for sending 70,000 food packages to concentration camp inmates. It's a fascinating, little-known tale of foreign intrigue, featuring an unlikely cast starring a Jewish Nazi spy, an ethnic German masseur, a World Jewish Congress official and a Swedish aristocrat.

Tears of Stone, the first feature film from Iceland with a Jewish theme that has come my way, tells the true story of Jon Leifs, the Icelandic composer who was forced to choose between his promising career in Nazi Germany and his German-Jewish wife.

Judging by Hilmar Oddsson's sombre film, whose theme resonates with intimations of conscience and morality, Leifs did everything in his power to save his marriage without jeopardizing his career. Yet, in his desperate quest to square a circle, he compromised the very marriage he yearned to preserve.

Amid mounting anti-Semitic indignities which affected him, his wife and two daughters, Leifs finally had to confront the ugly truth.

Chopin's Nocturne, a wordless mood piece by Ephraim Sevela set to crystalline classical music, takes place in Russia during the Holocaust. Two young lovers, one of whom is Jewish, enjoy a glorious summer holiday in a seaside resort. When German soldiers begin rounding up Jews, the lovers seem trapped by the swirl of events. The film is poetic yet puzzling.

Orthodox address problem of eating disorders

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The problem of eating disorders was addressed by the Orthodox community, for the first time in a formal way, at an all-day program held recently at the Lipa Green building.

The event, called Mirror, Mirror On the Wall; a Symposium on Body Image and Eating Disorders, the Orthodox Jewish Perspective, was sponsored by Emunah Women of Toronto, Jewish Family & Child Service, Netivot HaTorah, and Ulpanat Orot Girls' School, and was endorsed by the Vaad Harabonim of Toronto.

The focus was on anorexia, a severe restriction of food intake, and bulimia, relatively normal or binge eating followed by vomiting, purging by excessive laxative use, or the use of diuretics. There may be combinations of the two, as well.

In a moving introduction to the day, chair Shawna Magence, herself a recovered anorexic, urged participants to respect the "sensitive nature" of the topic.

Commenting on the presence of a number of young women who either have, or have had, eating disorders, she noted that "one [offhand] comment can trigger a negative reaction."

Keynote speaker Carla Rice was unable to attend, but her speech was delivered by Esther Libman, a Thornhill family physician. Rice described eating disorders as "compulsive, emotional eating." In the general population, one to two percent of women are anorexic, three to five percent have bulimia, and 50 percent of those have serious eating problems.

She said that 80 to 90 percent of adult women, and 85 percent of adolescent girls are dissatisfied with their bodies, even those who are within recommended weight ranges.

The message from the outside world, that one must be thin to be considered attractive, has more effect on people than their own families do on this subject, said Rice.

Child psychiatrist Leora Pinhas, director of the Eating Disorder Treatment Program at York County Hospital, and a lecturer with the Women's Mental Health Program, Department of Psychiatry, University of Toronto, said that in young women, the rate of eating disorders is "closer to 10 percent".

Anorexia and bulimia are potentially fatal diseases, Pinhas said, echoing Libman's sombre description of them as "the only psychiatric disorder with a mortality rate of 20 percent."

Complications may include fluid and electrolyte imbalances, heart failure, esophageal or stomach perforation, liver disease, and osteoporosis.

She urged parents and physicians to be aware of warning signals: lanugo hair (an excess of soft hair all over the body), as well as a loss of hair where it is supposed to be; cessation of menstruation; swelling of the parotid glands in the neck; and dental cavities, which can be caused by self-induced vomiting.

Some of these problems begin even before the person becomes seriously ill, Pinhas said, and "should be considered evidence of an eating disorder unless otherwise proved."

Anorexia and bulimia seem to "affect the brain at a biochemical level," she said, and recovery can take as long as seven years.

Sherri Wise, who teaches English at Beth Jacob High School, and is a frequent speaker on issues relating to women and Judaism, said that just as in the non-Orthodox world, girls from religious homes "from a sense of bousha (embarassment), may deny the severity of the problem and avoid getting help. If they do get help, the whole thing is shrouded in secrecy."

Particularly for those who rely on shidduchim for marriage, eating disorders are seen as an impediment to marriage, not just for the person who has one, but for their siblings as well, she said.

"Education is needed – to know is to forgive," Wise said.

Jews have "taken the messages of the outside world, and made them our own criteria [for beauty and worth], she said, rather than Jewish values such as kindness, modesty, and internal beauty .

"If we want to decrease our children's vulnerability, we must separate our child's sense of worth from his or her achievement. They have intrinsic value because of their neshamah," she said.

The key to having a healthy weight is moderation, the panelists and audience agreed. They also agreed on the necessity of education in proper eating and exercise, and in maintaining a generally healthy lifestyle.

Pinhas spoke strongly against the whole idea of "dieting," saying it doesn't work, and actually leads to higher weights.

Perhaps the most emotional part of the day came from testimony from young Orthodox women who have had eating disorders, who spoke about the lack of understanding of the problem, the lack of services, especially Jewish ones, and their personal emotional and physical pain.

Other participants condemned Orthodox young men (and their mothers) for demanding very thin girls as brides, some going so far as to demand thin mothers-in-law as well.

Israel posts best results yet at IIHF tournament

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Break out the champagne and sunflower seeds. Israel has finally done it.

After years as a tournament also-ran, Israel's senior hockey team has won a medal. The boys in blue are basking in the glow of a silver medal, knowing it coulda', it shoulda' been gold.

They came within a hair's breadth of winning it all at a recent International Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF) Pool D tournament in Krugersdorp, South Africa. The Israelis finished the tournament medal round tied in top spot with Spain, but a tie-breaking formula awarded the gold to Spain because they had scored more goals than Israel.

Adding to the Israelis' frustration was a referee's failure in the crucial matchup with Spain to count a goal that was in and out of the Spaniards' net in the blink of an eye. Neither the ref nor the goal judge saw it go in, even though TV cameras clearly showed the puck hit the back of the net, said Larry Bloch, a member of Team Israel. That key game ended in a 3-3 tie.

"It was a disappointment, yet we were really happy," said Bloch, one of seven Canadian "ringers" who bolstered the Israeli lineup. "We know what could have been, but not everything makes sense in this world."

Bloch, 38, was joined by six other Israeli passport holders: Ron Berman, Ron Soreanu, Brian Friedman, Eli Oosterhuis, all from Toronto, and Shlomo Levi and Sharon Peretz from Montreal.

Israel's silver-medal-winning hockey team

Berman, 18, wasn't quite as philosophical as Bloch regarding the loss. "We should've gotten the gold," he said. "It was stolen away from us."

Berman, a defenceman who plays Junior A hockey for the North York Rangers, is especially upset by the referee's missed call. It was his slapshot that bounced out of the Spaniards' net before the officials could see it.

Bloch, whose resume includes Junior A experience with Toronto Red Wings about 20 years ago, said the Canadian contingent added crucial depth and skill to the Israeli lineup.

"This was the best team I've played for. We were outstanding," Bloch said.

Israeli skater Sergei Zak,who played in the Russian league for part of this past winter, was named tournament MVP, while goaltender Evgeni Gusin was strong, allowing only five goals in four games – three at even strength.

Bloch said Israel played mostly a trap throughout the tournament. In its first game, Israel flummoxed Iceland, running up a 5-0 first period lead before going on cruise control and winning 11-0.

Game two was a dicier affair, as Israel faced off against its rival, Belgium. Prior to the opening faceoff, the Belgians tried to put the Israelis off their game by filing a protest over team colors. They claimed Israel's goalie was wearing the wrong color pants and that three skaters were wearing black helmets, not blue.

The IIHF rejected those "lame protests," so the Belgians turned to a physical game to try to keep the pressure on Israel, Bloch said. The move backfired, as Israeli popped three goals past the Belgian netminder in the first four minutes and went on to win, 6-2.

"They haven't beaten us in a few years and they were doing everything they could to throw us off," he said.

Israel played a disciplined game, clogging up centre ice, he added.

The two wins vaulted Israel into the medal round, where they faced Australia in Game 1 of a three-game round robin. Spain was the other medal round team.

"We played an outstanding game," Bloch said. "It was a huge victory for us. We haven't beaten them in years. Every year they come out and intimidate us.

"We checked well and they didn't have that much pressure on us. We played a pretty defensive game, but we got chances…That was probably the best game we've played."

Berman said Australia tried to play a hitting game, while Israel relied on better team speed and good teamwork.

Israel shut out the Aussies, 2-0.

Their second playoff game was against Spain. The two teams were tied 2-2 midway through the third period when Berman unleashed a cannonading slapshot that hit the back of the net and bounced out quickly.

The play continued, and when Israel finally got a chance to talk to the referee, he ignored a request that he consult with the linesmen. Despite being deprived of the goal, Israel kept its composure and went up 3-2 late in the game. But with a minute and a half left and the Spaniards pressing, a wicked slapshot from the top of the circle got past Gusin. The game ended in a tie. In its last game, Spain defeated Australia 5-3.

Since both Spain and Israel were plus-two in the medal round, officials used the second tie-breaker: goals scored during the medal round. Since Spain scored more playoff round goals, they got the gold.

"If we had scored an empty net goal against Australia, we would've won the goal differential," Bloch said.

A win would have vaulted Israel into C Pool play next year. As it is, Israel will return to D Pool though Bloch and Berman are confident Israel is not that far away from moving up.

Berman, who has played for the senior team twice, as well as for the junior under 18 and under 20 squads, sees consistent improvement in the Israeli teams. A lot of the team's best players are young guys, and Israel now has good depth, he said.

He'll be ready to answer the call next year again. "It's really good hockey. It's fun and it's a great experience, playing for your country," he said.

The Inside Back

Israeli politics inherently unstable

By JONATHAN SHIFF

Even before the government of Benjamin Netanyahu was brought down, calls were made to change the electoral system, and a rare alliance of Labor and Likud members of Knesset was pushing legislation to reverse the changes enacted at the beginning of this decade, which seem to have made a bad situation worse.

In fact, the public memory is short, and we tend to forget the fact that the changes came about because the old system seemed paralyzed, with governments vulnerable to Knesset members who would sell their votes for positions of power and influence.

The original system of government in Israel was very democratic: Any party which ran would gain Knesset representation in proportion to the percentage of votes it received. Thus, for example, a party receiving 10 percent of the vote should elect 12 out of 120 members. As in other parts of the world, this system of proportional representation led to a fracturing of the vote and the proliferation of small parties which, in other systems, would not gain a seat.

On election day, Israelis now cast two ballots: one for a Knesset party and one for prime minister. If no candidate for the top job gets 50 percent of the vote, a runoff is held between the top two contenders. It is now clear who the prime minister is, regardless of the coalition manoeuvring.

Other stabilizing factors were added: Parties now need at least 1.5 percent of the popular vote to gain seats in the Knesset, and the legislature can only vote non-confidence if more than 60 MKs support the motion. As happened this year, such a non-confidence vote also brings about general Knesset elections; so MKs will presumably be hesitant to endanger their own seats by bringing down the government. Elections may be held for prime minister alone only if 80 members of the Knesset or more support the motion. One MK quipped that it is easier to go from 60 to 80 supporters of non-confidence than from 60 to 61.

At the same time, Israelis can now split their ballot, and small parties have actually gained from the change because a citizen can choose a sectoral party and still support the candidate of choice. Furthermore, prime ministerial candidates, in practical terms, run independently of their parties, further weakening the large parties which had created some stability in the old system.

Netanyahu was the first prime minister directly elected, and the pundits spent the first year or two of his term complaining that he had too much power, as he seemed not to need his party. Now it seems he is too weak, as he was forced to swerve left and right to keep his government together, and then MKs proved themselves willing to bring down his government anyway.

In fact, I agree that the system needs change, and that a proper set of checks and balances are required. Having said that, it may be that a fractious society divided on basic issues and split almost evenly on the main one (as Israel has been for 20 years) will almost always produce an inherent instability. It seems unlikely that the problems were created by the system or that systemic reform will solve them.

Before tinkering more, Israelis need to ask themselves how much of the problem is due to the law and how much derives from other sources. Under the old system, the National Unity governments brought Israel mostly out of Lebanon and completely restructured the economy, while the late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin made vast changes (many of which half the country opposed) resting on a shaky coalition.

The new system, which was designed to allow the leader to lead, has not succeeded. Unless representatives in all parties who behave irresponsibly are punished by the electorate, they will survive and prosper under any system.

There are many examples of countries which seemed to be floundering until a more stable system of government was set up. It is clear that Israel's constitution will not be complete without a better resolution of this issue. At the same time, blaming the electoral system for the problems in Israel is inaccurate and will likely lead to further disappointment if another reform doesn't do the job. More importantly it will enable Israelis and their leaders to avoid their responsibility to seek solutions to the real problems we face.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My boyfriend Michael and I have been seeing each other for close to a year. We have many friends.

I used to look forward to my weekends, as we always had a party to attend and usually had a great time, but it seems lately that every weekend we end up having a major fight and it's always about the same thing.

He wants to leave early and I want to stay late. I have suggested that we take separate cars so that he can leave whenever he feels the urge, but he will have no part of that. He says we are a couple and should arrive and leave together. Personally I don't think he trusts me enough to let me stay at the parties on my own. He says I should be happy that he cares enough about me not to want to leave me alone.

Do you think he is being unreasonable or am I?

Couple Crisis

Dear Couple Crisis

Whether it is right or wrong for Michael to feel uncomfortable, leaving you alone at the party is really not the issue. The fact is that he doesn't like it, and you need to find out why, if you are going to solve this problem.

If the issue is one of trust, then leaving a party together or separately is only a symptom of something much greater. There could be many other reasons Michael is uncomfortable leaving you alone at a party. Could it possibly be that he feels there is a safety issue and would prefer seeing you to your door? Or maybe he feels like spending some of the evening alone with you? These are questions only the two of you can work out together.

Communication is the most important thing. There is no point in guessing. Talk. Listen. Be receptive to and respectful of each other's feelings.

Maybe you could compromise by not going to a party every weekend. Don't put yourselves in a situation you know will end up in an argument.

With enough will and love, you'll get through this and come out a stronger and happier couple.

Can Israel unite around Ehud Barak?

By YOSSI VERTER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — One Israel coalition leader Ehud Barak announced that the Centre party would be "an important part" of any government coalition he forms.

Speaking at a press conference after both Yitzhak Mordechai and Benny Begin pulled out of the race for prime minister, Barak declared that he had not cut any deal with Mordechai.

Barak said that he "respected and welcomed" the decision of the Centre party leader, and insisted – as Mordechai had – that the decision "was his [Mordechai's] and his alone."

Barak noted that he has known Mordechai as a soldier and commander for 30 years. "I've also seen him as a politician. Today he again demonstrated the essence of responsibility, political wisdom and how one should act for the good of the state."

Barak pledged to work to repair the damage caused by "the prime minister's divisive and inflammatory campaign" and reiterated his hopes of forming a broad coalition.

He said the government he hopes to form would be open to any party that expresses its support for One Israel's program.

He called One Israel a new party "that breaks down barriers" and is "changing the political scene in the state of Israel."

In related developments, the National Religious Party (NRP) did not rule out negotiating with Barak and joining a coalition headed by him, NRP leader Yitzhak Levy said. "We are not ruling out a coalition with anybody, certainly not with Ehud Barak."

The News in Brief

ISRAEL

More Kosovars Admitted

JERUSALEM — Israel's cabinet decided last Wednesday to admit 100 refugees from Kosovo for a period of six months, in addition to the 100 Kosovars received last month. The United States asked Israel, among other countries, to give temporary shelter to more refugees because of the worsening situation in the Balkans. The Foreign Ministry, in coordination with the Jewish Agency for Israel, will be responsible for bringing the refugees to Israel.

Underwater Parks Planned

JERUSALEM — Israel is building underwater archaeological parks for scuba-diving tourists off the Mediterranean coast. The parks, one of which is being built off the southern coastal city of Ashkelon, will feature ancient shipwrecks and submerged neolithic villages. Waterproof plastic pages will describe the exhibits.

Offensive Ad Pulled

JERUSALEM — The Likud party has pulled a radio ad that compared the Oslo accords to the 1938 Munich pact aimed at appeasing Adolf Hitler. "It was a mistake," a Likud spokesperson said.

WORLD

Extremists Were Involved

BUENOS AIRES — Members of Hezbollah and Islamic Jihad were responsible for the 1992 bombing of the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires, Argentina's Supreme Court said Monday. The statement came days after a tape-recorded conversation was discovered in which police officers are heard ordering a patrol car away from the embassy minutes before the explosion, which killed 29 people. Israeli officials, who have long maintained that both groups were involved, said the court's statement was overdue.

Law To Protect Camps

WARSAW — Polish President Aleksander Kwasniewski has signed a bill into law that would set up protective zones around former Nazi death camps in Poland. The government now plans to remove hundreds of crosses that have been erected near the site of Auschwitz, according to a presidential spokesperson.

Slave Labor Talks

WASHINGTON — German Chancellery Minister Bodo Hombach arrived in Washington last week for two days of talks on the creation of a fund aimed at resolving class-action lawsuits filed by former Nazi-era slave laborers. At least a dozen German firms have already agreed to participate in the fund, which the German government is trying to organize.

Shoah Tax Exemption?

WASHINGTON — U.S. House and Senate lawmakers called for quick passage of legislation that would exempt restitution paid to Holocaust survivors from federal income taxes. The bill would apply to all settlements reached with survivors, including payments already made.

Trial Could Lag

VIENNA — The trial of a prominent Austrian psychiatrist suspected of murdering children in a Nazi clinic during World War II could take months to begin after the doctor's lawyer filed a motion objecting to the charges this month. Heinrich Gross, 84, was charged in April with acting as an accessory to the murder of nine physically and mentally handicapped children while he was head of the clinic in 1944.

Tribe Has Distinctive DNA

NEW YORK — A tribe in southern Africa may be of Jewish ancestry, according to research that was reported in the New York Times. Genetic tests reveal that males in the Lemba tribe carry a DNA sequence which is distinctive to the Jewish priestly class of kohanim.

The Lemba reportedly practise circumcision, keep one day a week holy and do not eat pork. A scholar says he has discovered that the Lemba, who currently live in South Africa and Zimbabwe, emigrated there from a Yemeni village that was once the site of a Jewish community.

Satmar Chassidim Dealt Legal Blow

NEW YORK — New York state's highest court has dealt another in a string of defeats to efforts to set up a special school district for a chassidic community 80 kilometres north of New York City.

The New York Court of Appeals ruled last week that a 1997 state law that created a special district for Kiryas Joel – a village whose residents are all Satmar Chassidim – violates the constitutionally mandated separation of church and state.

The 4-3 ruling marks the third time courts have struck down state legislators' attempts to carve out an autonomous school district for Kiryas Joel.

The dispute began in 1985, when a U.S. Supreme Court ruling barred public school teachers from offering remedial education services in parochial schools.

In 1989, New York state created a special school district for the Satmars. The state School Boards Association, however, opposed the district. The U.S. Supreme Court ultimately agreed, issuing a 1994 ruling that ordered the dismantling of the district.

In striking down the latest law, the Court of Appeals ruled that the creation of a special district "has the primary effect of advancing one religion over others and constitutes an impermissible religious accommodation."

Survivors gather at conference

Rift with war claims agency revealed

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —A rift between Shoah survivors and official agencies which distribute money to them, was revealed at the first international conference for aging survivors, held recently at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

"There is a sense in the community that the conference is an arm of the German government," said Greg Schneider, director of institutional allocations and special projects, for the Conference on Jewish Material War Claims Against Germany (CJMWCG).

The Conference has just appointed Gideon Taylor as the new executive vice-president and has plans to improve communications with survivors, Schneider said.

His comment came after survivors in the audience of 250 complained about the absence of compensation for hidden children, delays in property settlements in East Germany, and the requirement that survivors travel to Hungary to pick up a paltry sum of $150 as compensation.

Under liberalized criteria for Article 2 or the "hardship fund" set up by the German government, the conference has received 100,000 applications, but only 50,000 qualify, Schneider said.

"I regret that we have had to reject 50,000, and I speak to you as I would to my own family."

Complaints regarding the forthcoming $500 settlement from the Swiss humanitarian fund to Canadian survivors were led by Dr.

Tragedy Has Struck

An extraordinary woman in our community—a 50 year old, single mother of 10 children, has tragically passed away after a serious illness.

Her modest salary as a secretary for one of our local Jewish Day Schools, allowed her to barely cover the basic family expenses, let alone the cost of expensive medical treatment and nursing care.

The children have been left with about $200k in debts and no further means of financial support. Funds are required for basic necessities such as food, clothing, housing and Jewish education.

The family desperately wants to stay together, with the older children taking on the responsibility of raising and ultimately marrying off the younger ones and themselves.

We appeal to you to support our community's efforts to establish a trust fund for these children. All cheques over $10 will receive charitable tax receipts. In the spirit of Jewish compassion and generosity at this holiday time, please open your hearts and donate generously. Thank you.

Damaged by 'nasty'

As these words are being written, the election campaign in Israel is winding down.

There are merely a handful of hours left before voters, in the secrecy of the makeshift, cardboard polling booths, actually cast their ballots for the candidates of their choice.

Two weeks ago in this space, I commented upon the nature of the "political fare offered for viewing on Israeli television," ruefully pointing out that much of it seemed "calculated to divide Israelis into increasingly smaller and more fractious factions."

Last week, in Ontario, the three contending parties in the June 3 provincial election launched their own political fare on television.

The largest Toronto newspaper described the ad campaign as "mean and nasty."

Professional advertisers and political strategists rather proudly describe them as "attack ads."

Like their Israeli counterparts, the Ontario television ads are aggressive, insulting and exceedingly disparaging.

Undoubtedly, these hard-hitting ads appeal to diehard, party loyalists atavistically, even tribally, in much the same way that schoolyard scrums do, exacting bruises, scrapes, cuts and gashes as the price of playing the game.

For those many of us, however, who left our schoolyard games when we left childhood and adolescence, the attack ads are simply offensive and irritating.

Worse than that, and even though many of us simply "click" off the commercials when they appear on the screen or on the radio, they are also potentially quite damaging.

The ads merely fertilize the dark, dismissive cynicism now deeply rooting inside the hearts of most ordinary folk towards politicians, politics and government.

Such cynicism, unabated, and reinforced with every mud-slinging commercial, impoverishes us all.

It robs us and our society of the notion that public service is a noble service, that government is altruism's vocation, not self-interest's instrument.

A young generation, increasingly exposed to their parents' cynicism and to the televised churlishness from which, in part, it derives, absorbs those negative attitudes like a dried sponge absorbs droplets of water. They mimic their parents' derision, and adopt their parents' disrespect.

Thus, saturated with a distrusting attitude towards politicians and politics, our children are "turned off;" they "turn away" from the possibility of building a better, more ideal world through public service.

How can we, as parents and as a society, not lament the in-creeping of this kind of socially and individually debilitating cynicism among our children?

One of the important ways to combat the cynicism, to restore in our children a belief in the possibility of public service, is for our politicians to set a better example, an example that inspires rather than deflates and that bends aspiration toward light rather than darkness.

In sharp contrast with the low example of the "mean and nasty" television behavior of our political leaders, is the high example of the classroom behavior of a Toronto educator who was honored last week by his students.

In an award ceremony sponsored by Jewish Campus Services, the UJA Federation-funded umbrella organization that helps to coordinate and energize activities and programs for the more than 15,000 post-secondary Jewish students in the greater Toronto area, Prof. Martin Lockshin, associate director of York University's Centre for Jewish Studies, received a special award for his "unparalleled commitment to Jewish life on campus." (Please see news story on page 28.)

As the following excerpt from his remarks that night will attest, Lockshin stirs our youngsters to strive towards their highest capabilities. He inspires them to believe in their highest possibilities because he believes in their highest possibilities. And he tells them so:

"I'd like to say one more thing before I sit down, a word of advice to the students, a word of advice that I received almost 30 years ago from a teacher of mine at CHAT, the late Rabbi Schochet, father of the Rabbi Immanuel Schochet whom many of you know.

"A year after I graduated CHAT, I told Rabbi Schochet that I was going to study in a yeshiva for a while and I expected that one day I would be a Jewish educator. He was delighted (shocked, too, I think), but he told me something that I'll never forget.

"He said: 'Once you become a professional Jew, you may touch the odd student, but most students won't take you seriously. They'll say, "He's a professional Jew. He's only saying what he's saying 'cause it's his job to say that."

" 'The time for you to influence people, Marty, is now, now that you are a student, now that you are not yet a professional Jew. Now, no one can write you off. Now you have credibility.'

"That's what I would like to say to all the wonderful students who were honored tonight. You have much power in your hands to reach many Jewish students and to be taken seriously by them. I've got a lot of confidence in people like you. Go do it." (My emphasis)

UN declaration on school funding expected in July

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A United Nations declaration on Ontario's school funding practices is expected in July – and the lawyer who presented the legal arguments believes the results are a foregone conclusion.

"I think the case is very clear cut," said Anne Bayefsky. "The result is inevitable."

Bayefsky, professor of law at York University, said she expects the UN Human Rights Committee will find that Ontario's school funding practices are discriminatory and violate Canada's international treaty obligations.

"I cannot fathom that they will not find a violation," she said.

Though the UN body does not have an enforcement mechanism, Bayefsky believes the finding will have a practical effect on education funding because "Canada, generally speaking, takes its treaty obligations very seriously."

The initial complaint regarding Ontario's funding practices was launched three years ago by Arieh Waldman, a Toronto parent with two children in the Jewish day school system at the time. The UN was expected to issue its findings in April but was delayed until the summer after lawyers for Canada, representing the province, filed additional materials "at the last minute. We consider it a delaying tactic because they've had lots of time" to file the materials, he said.

Delaying tactic

Waldman filed the complaint because he believes Ontario is in violation of the 1976 UN Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, signed by Canada with the approval of all the provinces. The covenant (treaty) states no country can discriminate against its citizens on the basis of religious beliefs.

"Canada does indeed discriminate against its non-Roman Catholic citizens in Ontario through its education funding practices," he said.

In Ontario, public and Roman Catholic schools are fully funded by the province while Jewish and other independent religious schools receive no government support. The schools rely on tuition fees and financial aid from community organizations.

Bayefsky said compliance with the 1976 treaty is "a legally binding obligation on Canada...Canada will have an internationally, legally binding obligation to adhere to the covenant's obligations."

While there is no international jail or police force to compel compliance, Bayefsky said there is precedent to show Canada changes its laws to comply with decisions of the UN Human Rights Committee. The Lovelace case shows the UN's views can have teeth, she said.

In that case, the UN Human Rights Committee found Canadian legislation discriminated against native women. A native man who married a non-native woman could bring her onto a reserve and she would enjoy all the rights and benefits of Indian status. A native woman who married a non-native man lost her Indian status.

Canada changed its law to comply with the UN finding, even though the Supreme Court of Canada (SCC) had upheld the practice. Bayefsky said the UN won't be influenced in the school funding case by the SCC decision that justified the discrimination based on the operation of the 1867 Canadian Constitution.

"That argument is irrelevant in international law," she said.

Bayefsky, who has three children in the Jewish day school system, was critical of the federal government for arguing Ontario's case before the UN body. "It could have gone back to Ontario and said, it's a violation of the law, change it," she contended.

Ontario Election '99

York Centre

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two newcomers to politics are challenging a veteran in the new riding of York Centre in Ontario's June 3 election.

Liberal Monte Kwinter, '68, represented the old riding of Wilson Heights, most of which is in York Centre, for 15 years. Challenging him are Roberto Hausman, 45, a teacher and educational consultant, the Progressive Conservative hopeful; and Norm Jesin, 43, a lawyer, the NDP contender.

Monte Kwinter

York Centre, with a population of 103,889, includes part of the old riding of Downsview and a slice of the old riding of Willowdale. The riding has more homeowners than tenants. It includes a lot of the Bathurst core region.

It is bound by the 401 in the south, Jane Street north to Grandravine Drive and further north along the Allen Expressway, to Steeles Avenue and south along Bathurst Street.

The candidates agree that Jews and Italians make up 50 percent of the electorate.

All the contenders in York Centre are Jewish, and on the key issue of public funding for the core component of religious schools, including Jewish day schools, Kwinter and Jesin say they will advocate for it, even though their parties are opposed, with Jesin insisting that all religions be treated equally. Hausman says he supports the present government's position.

Roberto Hausman

Kwinter says he is "totally supportive" of public funding for these schools, pointing to his sponsorship of a recent rally at Queen's Park attended by over 3,000 people.

Jesin, the father of five children, with three attending the United Synagogue Day School, says he is also supportive but insists that the public school system be maintained.

Hausman, who born in Uruguay to Hungarian parents, also has three children in a Jewish day school.

On the issue of better services for the riding's seniors, all three candidates agree with Kwinter in pledging to work out a plan whereby Orthodox Jews can walk to the nearest hospital.

Kwinter notes that he worked to have Branson hospital's closing put off for two years.

Jesin said he supports a moratorium on the closing of Branson Hospital, which he considers essential for the health of seniors. Referring to the death of his parents in Canada at the ages of 93 and 87, Hausman said he gives care for seniors the highest priority.

All three favor more affordable housing, Jesin pointing to the $250 million earmarked for public housing in the NDP platform, and Kwinter noting that the demand for affordable housing is so great, that people have to wait up to 10 years.

Norm Jesin

Hausman said people need housing at prices they can afford.

Jesin believes that the riding's westward expansion from Dufferin Street to Jane Street will help the NDP, judging from the number of signs in the area supporting him. He claims it is the most important election in Ontario in 50 years, and says the NDP contingent at Queen's Park has to be strengthened to keep the other parties "in line."

Hausman, who speaks eight languages, says the riding is one of the most multicultural in the greater Toronto area , and says his knowledge of the various immigrant groups will be an asset to the legislature.

Kwinter is upbeat about the riding's new boundaries, claiming he has no serious competitors for the seat, and pointing out that he canvassed the new areas thoroughly in bringing 8,000 new members into the Liberal fold to win the party's nomination.

Challengers target Harris in St. Paul's campaign

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Ontario Election '99

TORONTO — Incumbent MPP Isabel Bassett is carrying the Tory colors in the midtown Toronto riding of St. Paul's, but the two opponents to her left don't appear to be running against her.

Instead they've targeted Ontario Premier Mike Harris, saying voters are dissatisfied because of changes he's made to Ontario's health and education infrastructures.

In interviews with Liberal hopeful Michael Bryant and New Democratic candidate Larry Solway, Harris came in for withering attack.

Solway, a longstanding broadcasting personality, said he entered politics for the first time because of his "fury at the way the province is being run...He [Harris] is Attila the Hun. He's got to be stopped."

Larry Solway

Bryant was more circumspect in his choice of language, saying voters he's met "are telling me they can't trust Mike Harris with health care."

For her part, Bassett conceded she's heard negative comments about her party leader. But that's a result of Harris' strong leadership and voter discomfort at the strong medicine he's imposed on the province while revamping the education and health systems, she said.

St. Paul's, which includes the mansions of Forest Hill and the modest working class homes at Davenport and Ossington, stretches from Bayview Avenue in the east, more or less along Eglinton Avenue in the north, to Winona/Marlee in the west, and to the CP tracks below Davenport in the south.

An estimated 20,000 Jews reside in the area (about 20% of the population), according to Jay Brodbar, director of research for UJA Federation.

Speaking shortly after her return from campaigning on Dewbourne Avenue, Bassett acknowledged voters on the street were upset that Roman Catholic schools receive full government support while Jewish schools receive none.

"I don't think we should be funding one religion without funding other religions," Bassett said. "We want to have a system that treats everybody the same way."

She qualified her remarks by pointing out the Tories' first priority remains the public and Roman Catholic systems. After changes have been made there, "in five to 10 years, we're going to have to look at this issue," she said.

Isabel Bassett

Solway said "my general rule is that I want to support public education in Ontario. Anything that takes away from that is not the kind of thing I want.

"If there's another plan that's feasible, I'm prepared to listen to it," he added.

"I understand the issue and I'm looking forward to raising it in caucus," Bryant said.

"There's an advocate of this issue in my home," he noted, referring to his wife, Susan Abramovitch, an alumna of two Jewish schools in Montreal. But, "we should restore confidence in the public education system and then turn to see how much can be done" for independent schools, he added.

On the issue of home care, Solway blasted the government for "gutting it. I want to put it back. We want to bring back fairness, concern and compassion," he said.

Michael Bryant

Bryant said the Liberals believe in continuity of care from institutional settings to home care. If elected, the Liberals would allocate $510 million for long-term care and home care, he said.

Bassett said the government is responding to concerns over home care services and has earmarked $60 million this year for home care. "We recognize that is something we have to look at," she said.

Turning to the question of social housing, Bassett said the government "is trying to encourage developers to build more housing." It has eliminated PST on construction of lower rent apartments and has streamlined the approval process.

The Liberals are committed to build on the Golden report by providing PST rebates to assist with the construction of affordable housing. The Grits would also encourage the federal government to provide a similar GST rebate, he said.

Solway said with vacancies in Toronto near zero percent and with a crying need for more apartments, he "would like to see the government get in the business of building subsidized housing units."

All candidates voiced their support for anti-racist initiatives and supported the laying of hate charges when appropriate.

A Secret Getaway Revealed

Advertisement

The time has come to expose one of the best-kept social secrets of the summer.

For the past 6 years, a growing number of people between the ages of 25 and 40 have been disappearing for a long weekend during the summer to a place up north called Camp Manitou-Wabing. The event is called Adult Camp and it is just that. Adults attend as campers and have the run of the complex for one weekend each summer. Sound like an adventure? Read on.

The first thing that newcomers to Camp Manitou-Wabing notice is the beauty of the grounds. The new owners, Mark Diamond and Jeff Wilson, are proud of the first rate property, and all the fine facilities Manitou has to offer.

A typical day at adult camp begins with a delicious breakfast. Pancakes, waffles, crepes, eggs, fruit salad - I don't remember eating that well in my camp days. After breakfast there is a broad range of activities to choose from. The main attractions are water-skiing, tennis and golf. Don't play? Not very good? Never tried? - Not to worry. Included in the weekend are professional instructors who teach the novice, improve the intermediate and challenge the expert. Many of them are top ranked athletes, a fact I only learned after challenging the tennis pro last year. He turned out to be ranked number 2 in Mexico.

Around noon, everyone gathers for lunch. The dining hall provides the venue for another great meal and many excited conversations about the morning's activities. Many delight in describing their first time experiences water skiing, golfing, or playing volleyball, and how they have made great strides. The afternoon should really be televised. Have you ever seen 70 people play in one mammoth baseball game? Those who aren't playing sit in the stands laughing and enjoy the show. Whether you are a great baseball player or the kind of person who runs to third base first, it really doesn't matter in this game. Next is a giant beach volleyball game that is governed by similar rules - there are no rules. Pro or amateur, everyone makes a good showing.

Bunk bed or rock, it is siesta time for an hour before getting ready for dinner.

Refreshed and washed up, everyone meets for an informal outdoor barbecue. Stomachs full, we all trek down to the waterfront to participate in the famous age-old ritual of the pontoon boat ride.

Everyone boards one of the two large pontoon boats and the journey gets underway. After a 20-minute ride, the boats meet somewhere in the middle of the lake and are tied together. As millions of stars stare down at us, someone starts strumming a guitar. Everyone joins in singing songs we all know from when we were kids. Hot chocolate blended with traces of rum is passed around and adds just the right touch. You can't help but be caught up in the serenity of it all.

Later we make our way back to camp where we all sit around a huge bonfire. The guitar and singing resume. Some sing, others just relax, listen and breathe in the night's fresh air.

And that is the essence of the weekend in a nutshell.

A big part of the success of the weekend is due to the efforts of Mitchell Korman. Mitchell is a successful Toronto lawyer who takes time off each summer to help teach water-skiing at Manitou. Years ago he had an idea about organizing a weekend for some of his adult friends to come experience the pleasures that Manitou has to offer. Through the years Mitchell realized that the weekend could offer a special outlet, especially (though not exclusively) for single Jewish people who are fun at heart and athletic. He foresaw an event where many could get to know one another in a friendly informal setting, free of pressure, with only the promise of a great time.

The capacity for the weekend is capped at 150 people, and rumor has it that this year there will be some attendees from New York and Vancouver. Last year the cost was $350.00 all-inclusive, and I am told the price is expected to remain the same this season. This year's festivities will be held June 17th to the 20th. The cut off date for making reservations is Friday, June 4th, but I suggest you act well in advance in order to secure a reservation. A non-refundable $50.00 deposit is required. For more information and to make reservations, contact Mitchell Korman at (416) 777-2566 or by e-mail at korman@globalserve.net.

This weekend is an opportunity to get away, relax, and meet new people while having a great time. See you there!

Shavuot

A mere 50 days passed between the exodus of the children of Israel from Egypt and their receiving the Torah at Mount Sinai. But seven weeks was hardly enough time for physical freedom to evolve into spiritual and existential freedom. For in its full, dignity-denying essence, slavery is much more than a physical condition; it is an intellectual, psychological and emotional condition. It is a way of life more than it is a way of working.

In truth, therefore, the children of Israel were still a rabble of unruly slaves when they assembled at the foot of the lowly desert mountain to receive the law from God Himself.

Though a rabble, still they were able to burst through their bonds to commit personally, then, and for all time, to bring justice, purpose, order and God into human history. At that unprecedented, daring instant of human commitment, their slavery ended and a new destiny for the entire world began.

But it must have been frightening.

"As morning dawned, there was thunder and lightning and a heavy cloud upon the mountain and a strong loud blast of the shofar; and all the people in the camp trembled…

"And Mount Sinai was all in smoke, for the Lord had come down upon it in fire; the smoke rose like smoke from a kiln, and the whole mountain shook violently. The blast of the shofar grew louder and louder."

In the midst of this terrifying, fiery turmoil, God's laws were handed down to the children of Israel, and ultimately, to the world.

That epoch-making moment – when law joined with liberty and when responsibility joined with emancipation – is the cause of our celebration tonight.

Shavuot commemorates the advent of true human freedom.

Thus, at midnight, when the stars are in heaven and many Jews around the world, in the tradition of "the old ways," delve into the ancient and modern texts of our great sages, let us remember what real freedom is, and how precious it is and why it was bestowed upon us in the first place.

…and the election

This year, by coincidence, Shavuot falls three days after the Israeli election. The campaign appears to have highlighted if not actually aggravated, the internal fissures ever-widening within Israel society. In the aftermath of the voting, therefore, the key challenge facing Israel's leaders is to attempt to close those fissures.

Shavuot can help.

Among the many important symbols and lessons embodied in the holiday, there is one that leaps forward from its history.

Unity.

The Torah is quite unambiguous in recording that the entirety of the people, without faction, without division, stood at the mountain:

"All the people witnessed the thunder and lightning and the blasts of the shofar and the mountain surrounded by smoke."(Our emphasis)

To underscore the point that the Torah does not differentiate among Jews, Moses uses very precise language when he speaks, just before his death, to the children of the exodus generation, of the covenant their parents entered into with God at Sinai 40 years earlier: "You stand this day, all of you, before the Lord your God…not with you alone do I enter into this covenant; but with those who are with us here this day before the Lord our God and with those who are not with us here this day." (Our emphasis)

A broadly-based government that not only talks about unity but actually does something to achieve unity, should be Israel's highest priority now. Unity is the only bridge that can span those fissures.

WISDOM OF THE AGES

"Where you go, I will go; where you lodge, I will lodge; your people, my people; your God, my God." (Book of Ruth)

The magic of tradition in South Africa

On a recent trip to South Africa I had a "once-in-a-lifetime" experience in Oudtshoorn, a rural community best known for its ostrich farms and an impressive network of subterranean caves.

At the turn of the century, Oudtshoorn was home to approximately 600 Jewish families. Many made their fortunes as ostrich farmers during the "feather boom" when ostrich plumes adorned women's hats, necks and dresses throughout the fashion capitals of the world.

Today, 17 Jewish families remain. Several still operate successful ostrich farms and live in magnificent, turn-of-the-century "feather palaces." In addition to feathers, the farmers produce and export ostrich meat and skins for leather products.

It was at Welgeluk, a restored feather palace, built in 1910 and purchased by the Lipschitz family, that my husband and I joined members of Oudtshoorn community for a wedding and brit milah.

The groom was Stanley Lipschitz, a third generation ostrich farmer. He and his wife, Bernadette, born a Portuguese Roman Catholic, had been married in a civil wedding ceremony in 1984. They had three sons, the eldest of whom died of leukemia four years ago.

Following this tragedy, Bernadette began studying for an Orthodox conversion. On March 1 of this year, at the age of 44, she gave birth to a healthy baby boy. Eight days later, the 70 guests gathered on the lawn of Welgeluk in full view of a hand-held chupah. Surrounded by family and friends, the middle-aged couple restated their marriage vows, this time in a traditional ceremony conducted by an Orthodox rabbi

Following cheers of mazel tov, the guests moved inside the historic home where the rabbi donned a white coat and became the mohel, as those present prepared to witness the infant son of Stanley and Bernadette Lipschitz enter into the covenant of the Jewish people.

I marvel at the magic of our Jewish tradition that transcends unfamiliarity and allows strangers to feel warmly welcomed in a foreign land.

Appeasement of dictators is useless

The world seems to have forgotten some circumstances that led to World War II. When Britain's prime minister went to Hitler begging for peace in our time, all he found was that appeasement did not work. It still doesn't. Dictators like Slobodan Milosevic, Saddam Hussein, Muammar Khadafi, and a slew of Ayatollahs in Iran, who spill blood of innocent people, in the name of their God or ethnicity, found out that the world is past appeasing them. It will use diplomacy, and failing that, military power.

Hitler started his butchery, with Kristallnacht (night of the broken glass). This turned into Umsiedlung (resettlement). Another Nazi synonym was Nacht und Nebel (night and fog). This served for murder, beating, imprisonment in Dachau, Sachsenhausen and Buchenwald. Those camps became templates for extermination, gas chambers, crematoria and genocide.

These synonyms were easily translated by present day dictators, be they in Europe, Africa, or South America, who are into ethnic cleansing, or any other words, no matter how dubious, having a semblance of law. There is an old saying: "An ounce of prevention is worth more than a pound of cure." NATO is now administering the cure.

TV program on Conversos deserves rebroadcast

Some time ago, I saw a television program called The Conversos. It was about Jews in Spain who were forced to convert to Catholicism during the Spanish Inquisition, but remained secretly Jews and practise Judaism to this day. The program was shown only once and many people did not see this wonderful documentary. I wonder if there is a Jewish group who could arrange to have this program shown again.

Canadians who fought for Israel deserve honor

Your article "Canadians fought for Israel's Independence" by Eddy Kaplansky (CJN, Apr. 22) was most interesting, yet somewhat disappointing.

Surely, the selfless sacrifices of those brave volunteers had a more profound significance in the establishment of Israel than the generous donations of others.

It saddens me that they were, really, never formally acknowledged by Canadian Jewry.

Meditations for Tikun leil Shavout

It is traditional on Shavuot to stay awake through the night in contemplation and reflection, studying texts and wisdoms of our ancient and modern sages.

To assist readers in their moonlight Shavuot meditations, we offer our readers two texts, one by Rabbi Irving Greenberg, the other by Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook.

May your study be inspired and your insights, longlasting.

This world is not an illusion, says Judaism, nor does God want humans to surrender and let God do it. Nor will some divine fiat bring the final redemption into being. True, God loves humans. But although God yearns for a messianic consummation of history and even promises that it will come to be, God will not force humans to be free. In truth, freedom cannot be given to another. Freedom bestowed is dependency. Freedom must be earned.

How then can we reach this goal? Nothing less than a partnership between God and humanity will achieve the dream of perfection. By a process of voluntary self-limitation, God summons humanity to participate in the process of creating a redeemed world. Each partner enters into this treaty of total redemption; each brings a pledge to this binding covenant.

God pledges that seeking perfection is not an exercise in futility. God promises to accompany humanity every step of the way. The human partner pledges to start the process of redemption, to go as far as possible in his or her lifetime, to create life and pass on the vision and the responsibility to the next generation – and not to relent or settle until the final goal is reached.

This covenant means that God has accepted human agency. But this leads to a further covenant – the one between God and Israel. The people of Israel take on a binding commitment to teach the message of redemption. Israel promises to walk the way of the Lord.

In faithfulness to that commitment, the people of Israel pledge to teach the way of justice and righteousness as best it can; to remain distinctive and unassimilated in the world and thus hold up the message for all people to see; to create a model community showing how the world can go about realizing the dream; and to work alongside others to move society toward the end goal of redemption.

Thus the Jewish covenant mission will be a blessing for all families of the earth. For its part, the Divine is pledged never to abandon Israel, to protect and safeguard the people, to help in the realization of the dream. The divine promise includes the pledge of eternal life to the Jewish people: "You who hold fast to the Lord your God are all alive today." (Deut. 4:4)

The covenant of Israel turns the Exodus into an ongoing process. On Passover, God committed to the covenant by an act of redemption. On Shavuot, standing at Sinai, the Jewish people responded by accepting the Torah. The teaching that guides the way of the Jews, the Torah, became the constitution of the ongoing relationship of God and the Jewish people.

The subjects of the Torah are the stuff of infinity and eternity: a God beyond measurement or dimension, beyond human grasp or ken; a destiny that will outlast history. Such concepts are not commensurate with the limited, fragmented, imperfect world we inhabit. But through the mechanism of the covenant, infinity and eternity are converted into finite, temporal usable forms – without losing their ground in the absolute. The covenant makes possible Judaism's functioning in history.

Moses with the tablets of the law by Rembrandt

The Whispers of Existence

All existence whispers to me a secret:
I have life to offer, take it, take it –
If you have a heart and in the heart red blood courses,
Which despair has not soiled.

But if your heart is dulled
And beauty holds no spell to you – existence whispers –
Leave me, leave,
I am forbidden to you.
If every gentle sound,
Every living beauty,
Stir you not to a holy song,
But to some alien thought,
Then leave me, leave, I am forbidden to you.

And a generation will yet arise
And sing to beauty and to life
And draw delight unending
From the dew of heaven.

And a people returned to life will hear
The wealth of life's secrets
From the vistas of the Carmel and the Sharon,
And from the delight of song and life's beauty
A holy light will abound.
And all existence will whisper,
My beloved, I am permitted to you.

Opinions

Sikhs resemble Jews

We see them everywhere in greater Toronto, especially on the streets of Mississauga and Brampton; we find them as drivers in limousines and cabs; their bearded presence makes itself felt in our police force – they have become part of our Canadian scene. They are Sikhs.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

There are many more of them than we know, because the majority do not wear orthodox attire; no turban, no beard, women in short dresses; we would not recognize non-orthodox Sikhs if we met them anywhere. Sikhs have about the same number of orthodox members as we Jews have amongst our people. Depending on the locale, between 10-20 percent of the Sikh population are following the orthodox demands of their religion.

Just who are these people who once were known as the finest element in the British army? They resemble Jews because they too join peoplehood and religion – their modern tradition is some 300 years old, and this year they observe a special anniversary. It remembers persecution and the taking up of arms to fight it.

Sikhs resemble us also for the prejudice that others have against them. Being enterprising and independent, they quickly chart their way in their new environment – however far it is from their native India. They become entrepreneurs and do precisely what Jews have always aimed to do: make their new environment their true home, in which they can live peacefully as well as successfully.

How many of them are there in our midst? Estimates for the Greater Toronto Area vary between 100,000 to 150,000. I have come to know many of them because it was once my privilege to preside at a trial in Human Rights court. A teacher had sued the Peel Board of Education for having dismissed him because he was an orthodox Sikh and insisted on wearing a small kirpan, a ceremonial sheathed dagger, which is part of Sikh tradition. Though it is worn under the clothing and secured, and though in the 100+ years of Sikh residence in Canada, a kirpan has never been used for aggressive purposes, the Peel Board felt that Sikhs were endangering the safety of the schools. After a two-year trial, I ruled that with proper safeguards observed, the wearing of a kirpan represented a fundamental right of any Sikh. An appeal against my decision was turned down, and today Sikhs everywhere in Canada have the privilege of exercising their religion within the bounds then set.

In the process, I learned that many Sikh family values resemble those that we Jews would like to call our own. I also found that the tensions between the first and second generation are not unlike those that our people met when we first made the trek from Europe to Canada.

The next time you encounter a Sikh limousine or cab driver, engage him in conversation. You will find him most interesting, especially if he is willing to tell you his family's migratory experience. Canada has many faces, and that is one of its great attractions.

Words as sharp as swords

The Balkan crisis may have pushed reports on high school violence off our front pages, but to me the issue of how our children lead their lives outside of our homes should have more long-lasting resonance than the usual 15 minutes of horror and fame.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Certainly, the recent deaths of children at the hands of other children have horrified parents. Can their child become a victim of this kind of unanticipated violence? Can their children become so depressed and alienated that they could murder their classmates?

It seems that these terrible things all have a common thread. The children are taunted, bullied or ignored by the peers they look to for admiration and friendship. They feel rejected by their classmates, and scorned for their appearance, interests, even their skills and achievements. Spending eight hours a day in an atmosphere like that, perhaps without feeling they can tell their families what is happening to them, surely takes its toll on the fragile self-esteem of teenagers.

Well, fine you say, my children would never (a) be so angry and misunderstood, or (b) they would never say the things to others that have been reported. I wonder.

High school for me was one unending torment. A newcomer to a school that had long since set in stone its hierarchy of in- and out-siders, I was definitely on the outside.

I was smart, so in class I was a useful appendage to the trend-setters, but outside of class my clothes, my demeanor, my social status relegated me to the margins.

Fortunately, I found friends who were equally intelligent, interesting and accepting. I still keep in touch with them.

True, we never considered murdering our fellow classmates; but we knew we were on the outside. I hated every moment of high school, and burst into college determined to never, never be in that position again. (Thank goodness, I wasn't.) But did I learn kindness and humility? Let's say that is a work in progress.

As for my own children – did I teach them to welcome the stranger in their class, to look for goodness in every classmate, to keep their cruel and cutting remarks to themselves? I tried, but I don't know if I succeeded.

And who knows if they learned from us, as parents, the ways of speaking about people we didn't like or agree with. Did they then turn around and use these weapons of speech, words as sharp as swords, on their peers?

The Jewish community is not blameless. (I do not refer to the putative Jewish origins of one of the Denver teens.) In the day school my children attended, in their high school cliques, and even in the youth groups where, we were assured, they would find meaningful Jewish experiences, there were children who were different, and therefore cruelly excluded from the kids who mattered.

I don't know if teachers or advisers noticed or tried to do anything about it. I do know that if they, or parents, did intervene, their efforts made no difference. Of the excluded children, who knows what their relationship to Judaism is today? Alienation for some, I know, and lingering bitterness.

Since our children probably do not have mini-arsenals in our homes, there is less opportunity for their anger to become deadly. But the gnawing worm of rejection and anger can be just as devastating to their self-esteem and to their feelings about Judaism. Losing them in this way would be a great tragedy.

We, as adults, have formed opinions about our peers, judgments which are reflected in our individual and communal action. Jews are supposed to be well-educated, middle-class, successful folk who can afford to live in the right places, attend the right schools, exhibit the right symbols of status and achievements. The many Jews in our community who do not share these attributes, or who, by virtue of poverty, disability, origin or political incorrectness do not fit our tidy mold, are "other."

My suggestion for all of us: Let's do a quick checkup, first in our own minds, as to how we speak about those others, or indeed, anyone whose differences affect us. Then let's do a reality check with our children.

Are they being victimized, or even more frightening, are they part of the persecution which has had such a deadly effect? My children are past their teen years. Will I have the courage to ask them which side of the fence they were on? What their feelings were? Let's hope that such deadly hatred does not touch us, and let's try to make sure it doesn't.

This is the season for lernen

A colleague of mine told me this wonderful story: His mother has suffered a number of strokes and is in a nursing home in Toronto. One day, my friend and his son were visiting his mother. They were arguing about when a fetus becomes viable. In an attempt to involve his mother in the conversation, my friend turned to her and said: "So mother, when do you think a fetus becomes viable?" His mother seemed to ponder the question and then replied: "When they finish law school or medical school."

Bruce Elman in Edmonton

This is an extremely poignant story. A number of different lessons can be derived from it. The story says something very powerful about the continuing commitment of Jewish mothers to their children. The gestation period for Jewish children clearly extends well beyond the nine months of normal pregnancies.

The story also displays the Jewish concern – indeed obsession – with education. Individuals more scholarly than I can undoubtedly explain the Jewish penchant for education. It could be, that during the long years of persecution, when we were driven from country to country, education was a portable asset that we could take with us when other more material goods had to be left behind. Or perhaps, we recognized that education was the vehicle to achieve acceptance and success in the non-Jewish world. Or maybe, our long history of studying Jewish texts has had a carry-over effect into the secular world. We are, after all, known as the People of the Book.

Jews, as a people, have never been more learned in secular matters than we are today. Unfortunately, we have never been more ignorant in Jewish matters. Jewishly, we are illiterate! We may still be the People of the Book but the book is not the Tanach or the Talmud – the book now is Gray's Anatomy or Black's Law Dictionary! We know more about medical or legal ethics than we know about the Ethics of our Ancestors (Fathers).

The tradition tells us that Rabbi Akiva began to study Torah at the age of 40. Look how much he learned! Rabbi Tarfon is quoted in Pirkei Avot as saying: "The day is short and the task is great; You are not required to complete the task but you are not free to withdraw from it." We can cure Jewish illiteracy if we each begin to learn at least a few hours each week. The great oddity is that it has never been easier to learn than it is now.

If one wants to study the weekly Torah portion, one should start with Artscroll's Stone Chumash. There are numerous other books that provide commentaries on the Torah – Rabbi Joseph Telushkin's Biblical Literacy is one. The Internet also has a number of sites that post Torah commentaries (Divrei Torah). My favourites are Rabbi Ismar Schorsch and other members of the faculty at the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, Rabbi Shlomo Riskin of Ohr Torah Stone Yeshiva and the Jerusalem Post, and Rabbinit Chana Henkin of Nishmat Institute for Women. My friends each have their own favorites. A little Torah Net surfing can put one in touch with a great many interesting sites. It is traditional to study Pirkei Avot between Pesach and Rosh Hashanah. At our synagogue, we have been studying this text on Sunday mornings after minyan. We use the Artscroll Pirkei Avot Treasury. As we do not have a rabbi, this book has provided excellent guidance for our co-operative study of the text.

My Saturday Minchah/seudah chavurah recently decided to study Talmud in a somewhat non-traditional way. Instead of taking one tractate of the Talmud and studying it (which I do in another shiur that I attend), we have adopted a book entitled Swimming in a Sea of Talmud by rabbis Michael Katz and Gershon Schwartz. This book provides the reader with a selection of talmudic maxims (each known as a pitgam), the surrounding text and the historical context, and a modern explanation for the purposes of discussion. So far, this has been a big hit with the group.

When I would return to Sydney, at the end of the university year, my friends and I would usually go to visit Rabbi Israel Kenner and his wife in their home. We would sit in the rabbi's study, and he would ask us what we had been lernen (the Yiddish phrase for the study of traditional text) while we were away. When we told him Shakespeare, or organic chemistry or calculus or abnormal psychology, he seemed suitably impressed but also a bit saddened by the fact that we had not done any Torah lernen. I think he wanted to prod us to do some studying during the summer when the days are longer and we were free of our other commitments.

Rabbi Kenner knew that this is the season for lernen. As it says in Pirkei Avot: "If not now, when?"

The Kirshner File

Columnist Max Lerner exerted much influence

If you're under the age of 30, chances are you've never heard of Max Lerner. But if you're well into middle age, his name will probably ring a bell.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

In his time, Lerner was a university lecturer, an author and essayist, a television and radio commentator and one of the leading syndicated newspaper columnists in the United States.

Lerner, a liberal who later embraced neo-conservatism, was enamored by words and ideas. At the height of his influence, from the 1940s to the 1970s, he pontificated on the pertinent issues of the day: democracy and capitalism, fascism and the New Deal, the Cold War and the Cuban missile crisis, Vietnam and the Watergate scandal.

And as the Holocaust unfolded, Lerner – a secular Jew who identified with "the whole of Jewish history" – waxed indignant about this human tragedy.

Lerner, too, never wavered in his passionate support for Israel's independence and security, and urged Israel to consider territorial compromise as a means of coexistence with its Arab neighbors.

Born in a shtetl near Minsk in 1902, he wrote for the The Nation and The New Republic, as well as for the now-defunct PM and the New York Post, and his columns were anthologized in a succession of books. As an essayist, his magnum opus was America as a Civilization.

Such was his standing as a political pundit that the New Yorker once ran a droll cartoon in which a wife archly asks her husband, "Now that you've read James Reston, William F. Buckley and Max Lerner, what's your opinion?"

Lerner, whose acolytes included the historian James MacGregor Burns and the editor Martin Peretz, was a journalist who not only witnessed events but shaped and reflected the attitudes of his readers.

Seven years after his death, Sanford Lakoff, a political scientist at the University of California, has written what appears to be the first biography of this gifted man, Max Lerner, Pilgrim in the Promised Land (University of Chicago Press). Thoroughly researched and felicitously written, it is a balanced account suffused with cross-generational appeal.

As Lakoff relates, Lerner's parents, Benjamin and Basha who were related to Shimon Peres, a future prime minister of Israel, left White Russia because of the pogroms sweeping through their corner of Europe. Benjamin emigrated shortly after Lerner's birth and in 1907 he sent for his family. Possessing no real trade, he drifted from one menial job to another, becoming something of a Luftmensch in America.

Given the success Lerner attained, one imagines that his immigrant parents lived vicariously through their son. Indeed, they did not have to wait too long before he registered his first accomplishment, acceptance by Yale University as a freshman.

He majored in English literature and excelled in it, despite having to work his way through college. Lerner's life at Yale was dogged by endemic anti-Semitism. "No one was deliberately cruel or openly anti-Semitic," he recalled. "But the ... anti-Jewish feeling was none the less strong for being tacit."

On the eve of his graduation, he learned that, as a Jew, he had no hope of obtaining a teaching post at an Ivy League university. Feeling the chill, he enrolled in Yale's law school, only to drop out to study economics at the Brookings Graduate School in Washington.

Even there, racism was never far from the surface. In a perverse letter of recommendation, his professor described Lerner as a brilliant student, but then added: "He won't impress you at first, because he is rather unprepossessing in appearance – a little Jew who doesn't perhaps amount to much. But when you get acquainted with him, you will find that he is about two laps ahead of you on any question."

Lakoff speculates that the racist climate of the times had a profound effect on him. Though Jewishness would be a source of pride to him, he initially considered it a barrier to the full acceptance he craved and thought he could achieve only by complete cultural integration and intermarriage.

In 1927, after receiving his PhD, Lerner found employment as managing editor of the soon-to-be-launched Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences. Lerner, Lakoff observes, was one of the relatively few American Jews to establish an intellectual career in the 1920s and 1930s.

As his work there drew to a close, Lerner was offered a teaching job at Sarah Lawrence, a highly rated liberal arts women's college. In 1934, he was briefly director of a New Deal agency in Washington, but quit to return to Sarah Lawrence and to teach a course at Harvard. There he began a long friendship with Felix Frankfurter, a law professor who would be elevated to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Shortly afterward, Lerner was invited to be The Nation's political editor, a position he held for some years. Lerner broke into newspaper writing through book reviews for the New York Post.

This led him into fulltime journalism as chief editorial writer for PM, a New York daily which had been launched in 1940. PM fought corruption and racial and religious prejudice, championed the policies of the New Deal and was warmly supportive of Zionist efforts to establish a Jewish state in Palestine. As Lakoff notes, Lerner used the podium to become the Walter Lippmann of the democratic left.

In 1949, after PM closed, Lerner joined the New York Post as a columnist, and was appointed to the faculty of Brandeis University, which would be his academic home for 25 years.

Max Lerner (in 1972)

Lerner was a Cold War liberal. He backed the containment of the Soviet Union, convinced it was an aggressive totalitarian state whose aim was to undermine freedom everywhere.

He opposed the Pentagon's notion of preventive war, but endorsed American participation in limited wars in Korea and Vietnam to prevent Communist expansion into the Third World. Later, he had second thoughts about the wisdom of America's involvement in Vietnam.

At first, he agreed with the imposition of the death penalty on Julius and Ethel Rosenberg, the convicted Soviet spies. But when experts testified that the Rosenberg's espionage had not been as serious as the government claimed, he vainly urged President Dwight Eisenhower to commute the sentence to life imprisonment.

As for his personal life, Lerner was a congenital libertine, being unfaithful to his two wives (who bore him six children). Lakoff dwells on his infidelity at length, describing his sexual escapades at New Age retreats like Sandstone and Esalen and at High Hefner's Playboy mansion in Los Angeles.

One of his paramours was none other than film star Elizabeth Taylor, who had a yen for Jewish men (Mike Todd and Eddy Fisher, to name but two), and who affectionately referred to Lerner as "my little professor." According to Lakoff, he would have asked her to marry him had she not run off with actor Richard Burton on the set of Cleopatra.

In 1980, as Lerner's health declined, he wrestled with his own mortality. Throughout these debilitating years, he continued to write his column, which, in Lakoff's view, deteriorated. He also churned out books, lectured and travelled widely.

He died of cancer in June 1992, two months after he had written his last column and two years after his final book – a bittersweet valedictory celebrating his victory over illness – had been published.

He went out with a bang, not a whimper.

Simple truth of our Torah need not rely on glitz, glamor

By
RABBI ELIE KARFUNKEL

Let us close our eyes and try to envision the most remarkable and awe-inspiring episode in human history, the receiving of the Torah at Mount Sinai. The Jewish people – men, women, and children – standing at the foot of the mountain, all crying out "Na-ase V'nishma" "We will do and we will listen."

Picturing this moment, one might be shocked at the simplicity of the surroundings. The location was seemingly unbecoming of such a historic event. Couldn't there have been a better place than the desert, for God to bestow the holy Torah upon us? What about Israel, the land flowing with milk and honey?

Mount Sinai was also an interesting choice, a modest mountain dwarfed by many beautiful ones surrounding it. Our rabbis tell us that the accepting of the Torah at Mount Sinai was the wedding ceremony between HaShem and the Jewish people. Is a barren desert where one would expect such a ceremony to take place?

Rabbi Henry Hyman gave a fitting parable, shedding some light on this difficulty. The following conversation was overheard on a bus: A young man was told by the bus driver to put his cigarette out. The driver motioned to the No Smoking sign in the front of the bus. The young man defended himself by pointing to the back of the bus, which displayed two signs, one reading Smoke Luckies and the other: Smoke Camels. The bus driver smiled and answered, "the two signs in the back are in different colors, and are decorated with designs, while the No Smoking sign is in black and white. Never believe anything that is decorated. Believe in something that is simple and straightforward like the No Smoking sign."

In our times, we are inundated with hype. Every boxing match is the fight of the century. Every movie is the thriller of the decade. All of this rhetoric tries to make these events something they will never be. The Torah doesn't need all the hype. It gives 100 percent joy to all that embrace it, 100 percent fulfilment to all that live by its message. Truth does not need embellishment; rather it is diminished by it. A modest setting was therefore necessary in order not to dilute the eternal message given to us at that moment.

Let us not be deceived by glitz and glamor of other interests and venues. Rather, on this Shavuot let us find our comfort and joy through the simple truth of our Torah.

Shavuot palates turn to dairy

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

From cholent to chicken soup, much of the Jewish gastronomic year seems to revolve around meat and poultry. But with the longer days and warmer temperatures of the Shavuot season – our palates turn to dairy foods.

Today, some of the finest kosher dairy recipes on the Jewish Highway.

Shavuot is best known for the giving of the Torah, so why the association with dairy foods? Virtual Jerusalem lists seven reasons [http://www.vjholidays.com/shavuot/dairy.htm]. Two of the most famous: On Shavuot, the Jewish people received a new code of law, which included the dietary restrictions that became part of their daily life. Since the new laws of separating meat and milk were still unclear, only dairy products were eaten on Shavuot to avoid transgressing the unfamiliar laws. Another reason: The Torah is compared to milk, as it is written, "Sweetness drops/ From your lips, O bride; Honey and milk/ Are under your tongue." (Song of Songs, 4:11) [http://www1. snunit. k12.il/kodesh/bible/msir004.html].

Let's start with some of the dairy classics. You can find recipes for blintzes (regular and low fat) at Beit Chatulim http://www. geocities. com/Heartland/Hills/1259/shvdairy.htm]. The Jewish-Food Blintz Archives has over 30 variations, including Asparagus and Cheese, Fruit-topped and Henny Youngman's [http://www. eskimo. com/ ~jefffree/ recipes/ bliindex. htm]. (Take his cheese blintz, please?)

Gil Marks gives us his secret to 11 kinds of cheesecakes (including chocolate mint, chocolate peanut butter swirl and piña coloda) at Shavuot Summer Feasting [http://www.jcn18.com/newstand/MARKS/blintzes.htm]. Want to go beyond blintzes and cheesecake? You can strike up a conversation at Dairy Recipe Swap [http://www.jewishfamily.com/scripts/NewJfl/forum/forum.idc?ForumID=88] or at the rec.food. cuisine.jewish newsgroup [news: rec.food.cuisine.jewish]. Better still, check out the newsgroup's large Shavuot recipe archives where you'll find out how to prepare goat cheese and scallion kugel, carrot vichyssoise with orange nectar and some good old Montreal cheese bagels [http://www.cyber-kitchen.com/rfcj/category.cgi?category=SHAVUOT]. At Let's All Eat Dairy, Rosalyn Manesse has prepared a menu of Sephardic-Style fish, Linguine primavera and dairy scones [http://www.jcn18.com/scripts/jcn18/paper/Article.asp?ArticleID =1683].

One Shavuot tradition is to stay up and learn the first night of Shavuot in anticipation of the giving of the Torah [http:// www.virtual.co.il/education/education/ohr/special/shavuos/index.htm].

But what to eat during those long hours? How about low fat vegetable dip and a Pineapple-Raspberry Eye-Opener. You can find those recipes and links to some thought-provoking articles at JewishHolidays.com [http://www.jewishfamily.com/scripts/NewJfl/paper/Index.asp?ColumnID=39].

The recipes mentioned above are undeniably delicious. But I believe that the tastiest part of any holiday is its memories. I'm sure that Cyndi and her beloved Auntie Rivka would agree [http://www.empirekosher.com/shavuotblintzes.htm]. It seems that Cyndi's family had mouse problems in their home and decided to lay out some mousetraps. When Auntie Rivka dropped by to make some Shavuot blintzes, her niece quickly scooped the traps up and hid them in the freezer. When her aunt reached into the freezer to put away the cream cheese... well, the rest is family history.

May we all be blessed with sweet holiday memories.

The subject of evil

Books
Bernard Baskin

For The Time Being*, by Annie Dillard (Penguin, $29.99).

Evil seems to be everywhere. Nelly Sachs, the renowned Nobel Prize winning poet, cried out, "Who is like You, O Lord, among the silent, remaining silent through the suffering of His children?" It took only a few typhoon waves to drown 138,000 Bangladeshi on April 30, 1991. On June 15, 1896, a seismic sea wave killed 27,000 in Northeast Japan.

Twenty-two hundred years ago the Chinese emperor Q'in buried 10,000 clay, life-like figures to guard his grave. Later, this tyrant buried a multitude of his followers alive.

Why did God let the Romans flay Rabbi Akiva, using currycombs to separate the skin and muscles from his bones? Why are some children born looking like grotesque gargoyles, "with feet growing directly out of their loins, faceless or spotted or mewing infants, 'bird-headed dwarfs' with huge eyes and tiny chins?"

Annie Dillard, the author of 10 well-received books, dissects the subject of evil – among many others – in this unusual compendium that is filled with disjointed, but disquieting, insightful and often beautiful quotations and reflections on the meaning and significance of life.

A surprising amount of the material is derived from Jewish sources and tradition – largely chassidic. In 19th-century Poland the Rebbe of Ger asked, "How can evil exist in a world created by God, the Beneficent One?" He answered, "It can exist, because entrapped deep inside the force of evil there is a spark of goodness. This spark is the source of life of the evil tendency…Now, it is the specific mission of the Jew to free the entrapped holy sparks from the grip of the forces of evil by means of Torah study and prayer. Once the holy sparks are released, evil, having lost its life-giving core, will cease to exist."

There is about this book an aura of melancholy or resignation. Every year, 60 million people die; of these, half are children under five. "Excavating the Combe Grenal cave in France, paleontologists found 60 different layers of human occupation." The total number of persons who have ever lived comes to about 85 billion. The dead outnumber us, (now at about six billion), by 14 to one.

The author visits China and Israel, and finds inspiration in the thought and writings of the Baal Shem Tov, Isaac Luria, Martin Buber, the religious thinker Pierre Teilhard de Chardin who discovered Peking Man, Paul Tillich – and many others.

But ultimately, human beings are of supreme importance. "For the Jew, the world is not completed; people must complete it." So said a 19th-century Frenchman, Edmund Fleg.

Recently Rabbi Lawrence Kushner stated the same idea powerfully and bluntly: "God does not have hands, we do. Our hands are God's. It is up to us, what God will see and hear, up to us, what God will do. Humanity is the organ of consciousness of the universe…Without our eyes, the Holy One of Being would be blind."

The author states, that Aryeh Kaplan cites the paradox that the God of the galaxies, for whom a galaxy is of no more significance than a bacterium, is at the same time great enough that a single human being can be as significant as an entire universe.

There are perhaps 80 billion galaxies. "Each galaxy harbors at least 100 billion suns. In our galaxy, the Milky Way, there are 400 billion suns – give or take 50 percent – or 69 suns for each person alive. The Hubble Telescope shows that the stars are 'not 12, but 13 billon years old.' Two galaxies, nine galaxies… 100 billion suns, 400 billion suns …12 billion years, 13 billion years …These astronomers are nickel-and-diming us to death."

Musing on the tranquillity of clouds, the ubiquity of sand, the mystery of good and evil, the insecurity and holiness of life, Dillard weaves a poetic tapestry of contemplation and beauty. She informs us that according to the Talmud, God prays. What about? "May it be my will that my mercy overcome my anger." May that divine prayer prevail.

Maccabiah's positive messages

By IRVIN STUDIN

Guest Voices

I have it on good word that the stated purpose of the Maccabiah Games is to provide "an international gathering of Jewish amateur sportsmen and women, to promote the athletic prowess of the Jewish people, to strengthen the spiritual values of Judaism and to reinforce the links of the participation with the Old-New Land of Israel."

I joined the Maccabi movement in 1997, and was fortunate enough to represent Canada at the World Maccabiah in mini-football. The tragedy at the 1997 opening ceremonies notwithstanding, I do not hesitate for one moment to vouch for the integrity of the Games and their trueness to their stated raison d'être.

The Maccabiah preaches the perpetuation of the tenets of positive Judaism: dignity, modesty, diligence, kindness and pride devoid of hubris. And while the level of athletic competition is doubtless a main draw, it is these fundamentally Jewish values that drive the Maccabiah, and differentiate it so strongly from other brands of international sporting events.

Much more than dreams of athletic glory, it is surely this theme of positive Judaism that keeps athletes coming back to the Maccabiah Games every two and four years, to renew friendships, to party amongst brethren, to feel themselves Jews. Sport is subsumed under the much broader, more visionary purpose of reuniting the Diaspora, if only for three weeks at a time. The athletes participate in tacit approval of, and respect for, the spirit of the Games.

And so I find myself returning to the Maccabi Games – this time the Pan-American version, hosted by Mexico – not because I have been salivating for athletic redemption since Israel 1997, but rather, because I continue to tacitly support the positive Jewish message (and experience) of the Maccabiah.

Perhaps, however, tacitness no longer cuts it.

A fundraising package circulated by the head of the Canadian Maccabi men's soccer team, of which I am a member, flies in the face of everything I believe the Maccabiah to be about. One of the leading flyers in the package contains a picture of three men being liberated from the Dachau death camp in 1945. The flyer uses Jewish suffering during the Holocaust to justify a plea for financial support from prospective donors. (The soccer team needs $50,000 to travel to Mexico this summer). While not explicit, the invocation of Jewish suffering as a rationale for giving to a Jewish cause is clearly understood.

The end certainly does not justify the means in this case. Surely, exploiting the Holocaust for fundraising purposes is not what the founders of the Maccabiah had in mind. This is negative Judaism!

This cynical message is not representative of the belief of the members of the Maccabi soccer team. The positive components of the pamphlet that profiles the Canadian soccer team is much more an accurate reflection of why Maccabi sports teams – and the Maccabiah in general, should be supported by our community.

JWI/C president outlines goals

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO – Paula Mittleman, newly installed president of Jewish Women International of Canada (JWI/C), sees as one of her greatest challenges, attracting new women into the organization.

"[Our membership] is decreasing, while at the same time, we know there are women who want to connect to a Jewish women's organization. The busy women of today demand new models for outreach and affiliation. We must be willing to meet her needs," Mittleman says.

The organization is trying "to refocus and redirect our efforts so that everyone who wants to join, can fit it into her schedule. We're totally flexible."

Mittleman, who came to Toronto from Montreal in 1975, has been a member of JWI since 1987. Since moving here, she has taken Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto's leadership development program, and co-chaired Sholom Toronto, a program geared to welcoming immigrants to the city. "I am a strong believer in giving back to the community."

Paula Mittleman

Since joining JWI she says, she has met her closest friends, and has developed writing, communication and leadership skills. "I've also developed a confidence in my abilities. I really feel that the organization has given me far more than I have given."

Doing community work, she says, is a whole package. "You get something, you give something back. Many women today do not realize how important it is for them to go outside of their home and do something extra. They don't understand how much they will get out of it themselves. It is possible to have it all – work, volunteer work and of course, family and friends."

As with every organization, says Mittleman, money is tight, and she is looking for innovative ways to raise money for JWI's residential treatment centre in Israel, and for ASTAH, short-term emergency housing for women in Toronto, Montreal and Winnipeg.

"The Residential Treatment Centre is the heart of our international involvement and the boys and girls at the facility depend on us. We will focus on the Tikvah Campaign, JWI/C's personal giving campaign, the National Walk-a-thon Walk for Hope, as well as new fundraising opportunities which will reach out beyond ourselves and increase our donor base."

Enthusiasm, says Mittleman, comes from the top, and if the president is excited about the organization "it is infectious. I think my excitement will filter down."

The new Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged, and The Centre for Cognitive Disorders is going up.

It's going up at a tremendous pace.

The concrete shell of the building will be completed this winter. Anticipation is building. In those areas already poured, the walls of residents rooms are going up, the plumbing's going in and the wiring is being installed. Residents are looking forward to moving into a new facility that's much better equipped to meet the needs of seniors.

And, their anticipation will be rewarded. The rooms will be bigger, and all rooms will be private. Each room will have an entrance foyer and an ensuite washroom almost twice as large as in the current building.

This excellent new facility has been made possible by the generosity of our community. It's a wonderful achievement. If you have made a gift, please accept our thanks. If you haven't, please consider making a contribution to the ongoing work of one of the finest seniors' facilities anywhere.

Jewish Schools On Line

More and more schools are discovering that going on line is as easy as A-B-C thanks to www.jewishtoronto.net.

Designed to make plugging into cyberspace simple and easy, the jewishtoronto.net website has attracted close to a dozen Jewish day and supplementary schools as part of a pilot project coordinated by UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education.

"It all started when Bialik Hebrew Day School and Netivot HaTorah applied for funds to start a website," explains Joyce Levine, the BJE's Director of Inter-school Programming. "UJA Federation saw it as a great opportunity to develop an easy-to-use system that would allow even the most inexperienced computer users to set up a site."

Grade 8 Bialik students (l-r) Jessica Freiman, Danielle Schwartz, Maya Adler and Carly Ruderman browse their school's website.

Levine says accessing the site, through which schools can communicate with students and staff and connect to other organizations, requires minimal computer and internet knowledge.

"It's a simple and direct way for schools to showcase themselves and communicate with others under one umbrella," says educational computer consultant Jonathan Allen, who has been working with Bialik's website team. "You just plug in and play."

Although many sites are still in the development stage, community members are invited to visit school sites which feature school registration information, event calendars, newsletters, articles and photos. Some schools are exploring the possibility of posting homework assignments for students who are unable to attend class.

"We plan to be up and running by fall '99," says Alan Steinfeld, Netivot HaTorah's Executive Administrator. "Everyone is very excited about the project."

Web browsers can also access the BJE site which features updated information on everything from inter-school programming to reviews of CD-ROMS and links to other educational websites.

Sterling Steps In

The new Chair of UJA Federation's Women's Campaign, Carole Sterling, is stressing the importance of maintaining the strength and vitality of Toronto's Jewish community.

Sterling, who recently took over from outgoing Women's Campaign Chair Judy Engel, will lead the campaign, which raises $4 million annually, into the year 2000 together with Vice-Chair Dodi Weill, and fourteen executive members.

As the daughter of a Holocaust survivor, Sterling has carried out her personal vow to uphold Jewish values and the centrality of the State of Israel through a wide range of volunteer activities. She has served as Chair of the 1997 Walk for Israel, Vice-Chair of the 1999 Women's Campaign and is currently a member of the UJA Federation Board of Directors. In 1998 she was the recipient of the organization's Leadership Development Award. Sterling is also active in the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism and a participant in the prestigious Wexner Foundation program for leadership development.

"UJA Federation has provided me with a doorway into Jewish communal life, a sense of belonging to the bigger picture and the chance to make a difference," Sterling told more than 200 installation attendees. "We must continue to reach out to those currently uninvolved, recruit and develop future leadership."

In her farewell address, outgoing Chair Judy Engel, said "it's been a privilege to see the miracles of what we do at UJA Federation." Sterling described Engel's warmth, generosity and commitment as "legendary."

UJA Visits Refugees

By Ilana Hirt

UJA Federation's Past Campaign Chair, Leo Goldhar, has met with poverty stricken Jews in the former Soviet Union and welcomed new immigrants to Israel. However, he has never witnessed what he recently saw in the refugee camps of Albania.

Goldhar was the only Toronto representative on a North American mission to deliver relief supplies to Albania from the Jewish Agency, funded by the worldwide UJA Federation movement. There he saw, first hand, the anguish and frustration of the Kosovar refugees who fled the bombings and persecutions in Kosovo.

Over 5000 refugees overflow Albania's main community centre in Piscina.

"While sanitary conditions are not yet life threatening, it's a very stressful environment," he said at a meeting last week with the UJA Federation Women's Campaign Executive. Eight to ten people, according to Goldhar, must squeeze into a single tent in an environment where patience is at an all time low.

When it came time to distribute relief supplies, Goldhar said, "I saw the desperation as men, women and children crowded around the supply trucks." The Jewish Agency has delivered over 100 tons of supplies, including 15,000 blankets to the Albanian refugee camps. "I think that what Israel and the Jewish Agency do best is set the standards. They are setting an example for others to follow."

The Agency is also financing trips to Israel for Jewish refugees to consider aliyah. "While some families have chosen the aliyah option it has been a difficult task," explained Goldhar, because so many women and children fear they will never see their husbands or fathers again.

In Budapest, he witnessed the humanitarian efforts of Hungary's small Jewish community that is sheltering over 800 Jewish refugees from Belgrade, Yugoslavia's capital. Most of them are women and children fleeing the bombing back home. Males from the ages of 14-65 are not permitted to leave the Yugoslavian borders.

" I saw something that we don't see very often. One Jewish community taking in another without any reservations."

UJA mission participants, including Carol Solomon, National Chairman of United Jewish Communities (centre) help unload supplies in the Tirana refugee camp.

"Our news desensitizes everything," Goldhar added. "When you speak to Kosovar Albanians and Jews from Yugoslavia personally, you realize that each one is a person. Each and everyone is in a terrible situation. It is tragic."

During the Israel portion of his mission, Goldhar watched a mother at an absorption centre break down as she spoke on the phone to her Yugoslavian husband, who serves in the country's reserve forces and cannot leave.

However, accompanying all these tragic tales were stories of optimism and hope. Many of the young refugees, Goldhar noted, were talented, well educated and eager to learn. Among them was 22-year-old Anita Patakea, a pianist who hopes to be a successful candidate in one of Israel's music programs. Like many others, she had to leave her family and friends behind in Belgrade.

Leo Goldhar's experiences in Albania, Hungary and Israel have reinforced his long-held conviction about the importance of supporting the Jewish Agency through UJA Federation. "No other organization in the world," he said, "is so connected to the Jewish people, especially to those in distress."

Bronfman Invests In Jewish Future

The Edward Bronfman Family Foundation has established a $1 million donor advised endowment fund as part of a new UJA Federation initiative to help finance the future growth and development of Toronto's Jewish community. UJA Federation will soon be launching Jewish Toronto Tomorrow, a forward looking community vision that involves partnerships with other organizations to secure funding for the future.

"I feel it's important to demonstrate leadership in order to motivate others," said Edward Bronfman, who, along with son David, recently visited UJA Federation offices to personally present the cheque for $1 million. "I learned about tzedakah from my father and I am proud to be carrying on the tradition with my own family. My family and I are fortunate to be a part of Toronto's Jewish community and we are pleased to be in a position to contribute and influence others."

The foundation will be recommending allocations for the income earned from this endowment fund on an annual basis. Bronfman Foundation director, Dayle Rakowsky, said the family has always placed special importance on projects involving innovative community services, which will be explored for future support.

"Donor advised funds enable contributors to become real partners with the community," noted Rakowsky. "It's definitely the best way to secure the future of our community."

Cantor Steinhouse celebrating 25 years at Temple Har Zion

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

Cantor Martin Steinhouse

TORONTO — Celebrating his 25th anniversary at Temple Har Zion on May 16 Cantor Martin Steinhouse looked back on his career: a learning disability kept him out of high school, but never spoiled his love of singing.

At West Preparatory School in Forest Hill, the future cantor was plagued with what has come to be called – attention deficit. He had difficulty concentrating and as a consequence, he never went on to high school.

But as a baritone soloist, he was taken in hand by the late Cantor Zvee Aroni of Beth Emeth Synagogue. Steinhouse launched his career 30 years ago.

He says his learning disability – he still has to work around it — has sparked a special interest in working with youth.

At Temple Har Zion he has introduced a peer-tutoring system, which encourages the older youth to maintain their self-esteem and remain involved with the synagogue, while the younger youth learn from the older kids by trying to emulate them.

He has reached out to youths with learning disabilities, and has prepared them for bnei/bnot mitzvah. He has also inspired the tutors to work with learning disabled children.

Steinhouse went to work at age 16 as a shipper in a ladies' dress factory, before going into sales and management in the car business.

As a teenager he sang in the Farband choir with his late father George and his uncle, the late Cecil Roebuck.

Later he sang in the choirs at Adath Israel and Bais Yehuda congregations.

At the concert marking his silver anniversary, seven cantors and the Temple Har Zion choir performed. The guests were cantors Eli Kirshblum, of Adath Israel; Anna Trubashnik, of Temple Emanu-El; Efraim Sapir, of Beth Tikvah; Benjamin Maissner, of Holy Blossom; Thomas Schwarz, formerly of Temple Sinai and now retired; and David Goldstein, of Temple Beth Zion, Buffalo.

Steinhouse is proud that in the 600-family temple he has 100 children involved in three choirs, primary, religious school, and youth. In addition there is an adult volunteer choir.

The first and only cantor Temple Har Zion has ever had, Steinhouse began working full time five years ago.

"I love davening and I like to help kids," he said.

Steinhouse and his wife, Rachel, have two married children, Rivka Garson, and David, and one grandchild, Hailey Garson, who is seven months old.

With your support, this whole page could be filled with educated young Jews.

Look into all the eyes in the upper left-hand corner. In each pair lies the spirit and hope of a new generation, as well as the spark of 3000 years of Jewish knowledge. These young people are intelligent, well-rounded and self-aware, with an understanding of their value to American society.

They are the students in Jewish High Schools across the country, from all backgrounds across the spectrum of Jewish life.

The schools listed to the right are the latest in a growing movement of Jewish High Schools. They have all received AVI CHAI grants to promote their educational vision to the community and recruit more students. Jewish High Schools are striving to provide Jewish youth with critical thinking, morality, spirituality and deep knowledge of the core texts of our heritage. As well as an outstanding general education that is allowing graduates to be accepted to top universities.

Most of the space above is empty. Unfortunately, only a small percentage of Jewish youth are receiving this education. We need to make Day Schools available to more students. Schools must exist wherever there is a Jewish population. They must be affordable. And they must maintain standards of excellence.

In our free brochure, you will see the faces and hear the stories of Day School alumni who are going on to live extraordinary lives. Of educators and their commitment to teaching a new generation. Of funders and their vision of a bright Jewish future.

By supporting your local Jewish Day School, you can help fill the empty space with the educated and excited faces that will assure our Jewish future. Learn how by calling 1-800-240-5989.

DVI president seeking recruits

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Trudi Birger

TORONTO — German-born Holocaust survivor, Trudi Birger, who as an 8-year-old child in a concentration camp was snatched from the doors of the crematorium by a commander, has devoted her life to fulfilling the promise she made when she was rescued.

"I vowed from that moment on, never to leave any child in distress," she recalls, "even if it meant I had to create miracles myself."

The mother of three and grandmother of nine has devoted her life to helping needy children. Birger is founder and president of Dental Volunteers for Israel (DVI), a non-profit, apolitical organization that provides free dental care to underprivileged children.

Birger, who visited Toronto recently from her home in Israel, to raise funds and recruit dentists for DVI, spoke at an Alpha Omega Dental Fraternity dinner, met with United Israel Appeal representatives, and attended the Ontario Dental Association convention.

Dubbed "the wonder child of the camps" Birger, a petite, blonde with sparkling blue eyes, is a tireless volunteer for poor families across Israel.

A microbiologist who gave up her career to become a volunteer, Birger established the Adopt-a-Child project, which she worked at after her work day. It became a universal model for helping underprivileged families.

"In the course of my voluntary work with needy families, I noticed that many children were in pain because their parents could not afford to provide them with dental care."

When she learned that the municipality had closed its school dental clinics due to lack of funds, she decided to help. (There is no dental insurance in Israel.) She founded DVI in 1980.

Since then, almost 2,500 dentists from 14 countries have participated in the program, paying their own way to come to Israel. They work in the clinic for periods of one to four weeks.

They get free apartments and in their spare time, they enjoy a busy schedule of trips and lectures and receive free concert and other event tickets. Many dentists have made return visits for what they call a working holiday.

The volunteers, aided in their work by eight bilingual assistants, treat more than 200 children a day, from ages 5 to 19. While waiting their turn, children and parents watch educational videos in the clinic's new prevention centre, where courses are regularly held on dental hygiene and nutrition.

Birger says that some 120 volunteers a year come to the clinic – about eight from Canada. She was enthusiastic after her talk at Alpha Omega and says she expects that there will be more than 16 volunteers coming from Canada this year.

She says, "I hope to recruit more Jewish dentists, as 95 percent of all dental volunteers are not Jewish."

The late Dr. Alfred Intrater was the driving force in the establishment of DVI in Canada and Dr. Stanley Jacobson is the current chair.

Birger notes that the women's auxiliary of Alpha Omega has an annual fundraising event for DVI.

"DVI is my life project. It is a project which has a broader benefit.

"It provides an opportunity for Israelis – Jews, Palestinians and Christians, and new immigrants from Russia, Ethiopia and Syria – to come together in a waiting room. There are very few other opportunities for all denominations to get together."

Birger received the Israeli President's Award for Volunteerism from Yitzhak Navon, president of the State of Israel in 1982. She was named Worthy of Jerusalem by Mayor Teddy Kollek in 1991, and this year, she was awarded one of Israel's most prestigious citations for communal service, The Health Minister's National Council of Volunteers in Israel Award.

Birger recently published a book on her life during the Holocaust titled, A Daughter's Gift of Love, which has been published in 13 countries.

"The book is a best seller in Italy and the publisher told me that the Pope has contacted them and wishes to meet with me."

She adds that she is looking for a producer to film her miraculous story of the Kovno Ghetto and the Stutthof concentration camp. Danish television recently presented a one-hour program on Birger's war experiences and her volunteer work.

Seniors vent concerns over Holocaust reparations

Robert Krell, of Vancouver, a keynote speaker at the conference. He said the proposed settlement has caused turmoil in the ranks of British Columbia survivors.

"Is the trouble worth a couple of hundred dollars?" he asked. "If it was up to me, I would hand it back." His statement brought applause.

In reply to Krell, Rabbi Gunther Plaut, chair of the Canadian committee, said $2.5 million of the Swiss fund was allotted to Canada by the CJMWCG.

The settlement, which will be sent out in August, has to be divided among about 5,000 survivors who have filed claims that they are needy. Applications must be in before May 25.

One woman said she was "insulted" that she had to claim she was in need to get the $500. Another said she would give her $500 to charity.

Sam Catzman, of Beth Radom congregation, said officials had never checked with his synagogue to find out where survivors are living or whether they are in need.

More than 100 Canadians who were hidden with their families in the hills of Slovakia have been denied any compensation, Edmond Lipsitz said.

"They have been told that only those children who were separated from their families by being sent to convents, are eligible," he said.

The Conference is still trying to change the rules; the matter is complicated by the fact that young people are considered to have an adequate income of their own, Schneider said.

"You had seven years to find me," Gerda Freiberg said, complaining that the Conference took title to properties her mother's sister owned in East Germany. Schneider explained that heirs had to file their claims before the end of 1992.

Compensation for slave laborers is now being worked out with German firms and the German government, Schneider said in response to a question.

The Conference wants two pools of money set up, one for slave labor, which included most Jews, and one for forced labor, covering most non-Jews.

Some Canadians will be eligible for slave labor compensation, said Moshe Ronen, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, and a participant on the panel.

"The Shoah is unique in human history," Ronen said. "Jews were killed not for political conversion, not even for revenge, but for obsessive anti-Semitism."

He said he was thankful that Canada is offering a haven to Kosovar refugees. "At least the world has learned not to stand idly by."

He expressed annoyance that the government has not yet said it would support a free-standing Holocaust museum in Ottawa.

Baycrest Centre has 400 survivors among its population, said Roz Davidson, a conference co-chair. Another co-chair, Judy Cohen, thanked the speakers.

Survivors urged to pursue war era insurance claims

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Red tape, the lapse of 50 years and intractable companies should not prevent Holocaust survivors or heirs of its victims from pursuing war-era insurance claims, says a U.S. expert.

European-based insurance companies, especially those with subsidiaries wishing to do business in North America, are reluctantly beginning to pay out claims from the era, Deborah Senn, Washington state's insurance commissioner, told a small audience here last week in a talk sponsored by B'nai Brith Canada and Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

Some firms are paying out claims only because their refusal to do so would prevent them from doing business in the U.S. Senn said the Swiss-based giant Zurich has agreed to examine Holocaust-era claims because it wants to buy Farmers, a large U.S. insurer.

Senn, who regulates all areas of insurance in her state, said she discovered that Allianz Holdings of Germany, one of the world's largest insurance companies, has 12 subsidiaries in Washington alone.

She said at least 15 insurance companies have outstanding claims from Jewish families dating from the war, including Allianz, Zurich, Victoria Berlin and Assicurazioni Generali. During the war, salesmen from some firms went door-to-door selling policies, knowing their buyers would likely be deported and never seen again, she said.

The total amount of unpaid war-era claims on home, life, car and property insurance is in the billions of dollars, she estimated. Many policies were backed by U.S. dollars or gold, she added.

Earlier this month in London, five companies made significant concessions that should open the way to real progress.

A breakthrough at the final meeting of the seven-month-old International Commission on Holocaust Era Claims, chaired by former U.S. Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger, averted a last-minute crisis.

Eagleburger had threatened to tell the media that the talks had failed.

But at the 11th hour, the insurers agreed that policies dating back to the Holocaust should have interest and present-day currency values factored in when the policies are paid out.

As a result, a policy bought for $3,000 would be worth as much as $100,000 today.

Senn said she encountered resistance from companies when she first looked into the issue, but today, a number of them have come to the table.

She scoffed at the excuses some of them have used: that the policy-holder produced no death certificate, or that the country in which the policy was issued was nationalized by communists after the war.

Last year, the Italian-based insurer Generali established a $12 million fund in Israel to pay out claims. The company recently produced a CD of more than 100,000 names relating to unclaimed policies. But Senn said a claims process must be up and running before those names can be made public.

She and a team she assembled, attended last December's hearings in Washington, D.C. on war-era insurance and looted art. Canada sent seven delegates to the conference.

She said a national mechanism, such as a toll-free telephone number, is needed both in the U.S. and Canada.

In this country, the Canadian Life and Health Insurance Association has set up a hotline to handle Holocaust-era claims. The number is 416-359-2008.

"This isn't just about insurance claims," Senn said. "It's about memory. And it's a tool to teach the world about the Holocaust. We must use that tool."

Ve'ahavta to honor five for humanitarian activities

TORONTO — Unsung heroes will be honored at a unique evening on June 8 by Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee.

The group, which is engaged in several humanitarian activities in Toronto and overseas, will pay homage to five heroes, some of whom risked their lives to help their fellow human beings.

Demetri Vardoulias

Ve'ahavta's Tribute to Acts of Courage will also feature musical presentations by Michael Burgess, Amy Sky, Liberty Silver, Billy Newton-Davis and Karen Wierzba.

A kosher dinner will be served under an open-air tent at Southbrook Farms in the city of Vaughan.

"This will be the Farm-Aid of Canada," enthuses co-ordinator Sandy Stern, referring to the many rock acts that performed in the 1980s to raise money for U.S. farmers.

The evening's honorees will be:

• Joseph Enyew, an Ethiopian Jew. At age 19, Enyew turned aside an offered flight to Israel, preferring to give it to a fellow Falasha. He spent the next year working with the Mossad to rescue some 1,500 Ethiopian Jewish refugees in the camp. He was often caught and tortured for his actions. Today, Enyew lives in Toronto and is on Ve'ahavta's board.

• Four Filipino sailors who risked their safety to ensure that the officers of the Taiwanese freighter, Maersk Dubai, were brought to justice for the murder of three Romanian stowaways. In 1998, the sailors were granted permission to stay in Canada.

• Col. Ed Fitch, who next month will become Canada's first Jewish general. In 1995, Fitch voluntarily extended his tour of duty in the former Yugoslavia to help NATO forces rebuild the country. (A full profile of Fitch will run in The CJN in the coming weeks.)

• Demetri Vardoulias, who will be honored posthumously for having rescued a Jewish child when Athens was occupied by the Nazis. He raised the child as his own. Vardoulias died in 1989.

• Shyrna Gilbert, a Toronto teacher who saved the life of a man who was her host while she was on a teaching program in Rwanda. In Toronto, she founded Hope for Rwanda Children's Fund to aid orphans of the country's genocide.

Sorin Hershku: Entebbe Hero

After only 30 days of active service, Sorin Hershku became a veteran of the Yom Kippur War. Sorin continued his role with the IDF earning the rank of sergeant. A paratrooper by training, he was ideally suited for what was to become the world's most daring hostage rescue - The Raid on Entebbe.

Sorin was shot by a Ugandan guard. After being on the brink of death, he survived, but as a quadriplegic.

Through hard work and the support of family and Beit Halochem, Sorin managed to overcome his disabilities and successfully completed his Masters program at the University of Tel Aviv. It was during an evening course at Beit Halochem that he encountered his first computer and he has since established himself as a very busy and successful computer programmer.

"Through the years, Beit Halochem has always been central to the way I cope with my limitations. I can take part in activities there that I can't anywhere else: physiotherapy, hydrotherapy, target shooting, classes and many other activities."

Brym focuses on Russian Jewry

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Although he has visited Russia only once, Robert (Bob) Brym, a University of Toronto sociologist, is one of Canada's foremost authorities on Russian Jewry.

The son of East European Jewish immigrants, he has been studying the sociology of Russian Jews for slightly more than two decades now.

In 1978, when he was a professor at Memorial University in Newfoundland, he wrote The Jewish Intelligentsia and Russian Marxism, an analysis of the lives of 250 Russian Jewish intellectuals whose ideologies ran the gamut from Bolshevism and Bundism to Menshevikism and Zionism. Among his subjects were Lev Trotsky, Lev Kamenev, Vladimir Medem and Ber Borochov.

This, in turn, broadened Brym's interest in Russia and the Soviet Union. While still at Memorial University, Brym, 47, met Victor Zaslavsky, a Russian Jewish academic who had immigrated to Canada in 1976. They jointly wrote Soviet-Jewish Emigration and Soviet Nationality Policy.

In 1989, two years before the dissolution of the Soviet Union, Brym paid his first and so far only visit to the country whose depths he has plumbed so assiduously.

The Russian Academy of Science invited him to a sociological conference, and Brym jumped at the chance. It had a lasting impact on him. Several years later, he and a Russian collaborator, R. Ryvkina, conducted what he says was the first ever scientific survey of Jews in Russia, Ukraine and Belarus.

Published in 1994 under the title The Jews of Moscow, Kiev and Minsk, the book examined three inter-related issues: identity, anti-Semitism and emigration.

Since then, Brym has written several monographs on the state of Russian Jewry, the last one being Russian Anti-Semitism, 1999-2000. He presented the paper at a Harvard University conference last February. It will be published in a volume of essays, Jewish Life after the USSR: A Community in Transition, edited by two of the major scholars in the field, Zvi Gitelman and Marshall Goldman.

At the moment, Brym and a colleague from the University of Windsor, Tanya Basok, are working on a federal government survey of Toronto's Russian Jewish community. "My impression is that Russian Jews are not well integrated into Toronto's Jewish community," he said. "They come from a culture in which their Jewishness did not figure as a positive element of their identity. In a sense, Russian Jews appear alien to Toronto Jews."

In addition, Brym is putting together research proposals for surveys concerning the emergence of a "civil society" in Russia. These polls, he explained, touch on Russian attitudes toward Jews.

Brym, who relies on the Internet for much of his raw data about Russia, believes that the fate of Russian Jewry depends less on the level of grassroots anti-Semitism than on the policies of highly placed politicians.

"Like the Soviet leadership, Russian political leaders today can help to dry up Russia's ample reservoir of anti-Jewish sentiment, or they can draw on it for their own sustenance."

According to Brym, the Communist party, which may yet control parliament (Duma) after the next election, has used anti-Semitism to galvanize support. "Very senior political figures are legitimizing anti-Semitism, suggesting that Jews are responsible for Russia's current economic ills."

Brym warned that their harangues could ultimately be disastrous for Jews. "It may result in Brezhnev-era employment restrictions. The old numerus clausus could be resurrected."

In his view, Russia's politically weak president, Boris Yeltsin, has not seriously confronted anti-Semitism. Yet, anti-Semitism is not the force driving Jews out of Russia. "The majority of Jews in Russia today are intermarried and assimilated, and may not identity strongly as Jews. If they leave, it will be for economic reasons connected with the collapse of the ruble last August."

Brym pointed out that there are no reliable statistics regarding the number of Jews living in Russia. "There are from 250,000 to 600,000 Jews, depending on your definition of a Jew."

Despite his fascination with the topic, Brym spends relatively little of his time on Russian Jewry these days, part of the reason being that research funds are in short supply.

Brym, whose additional area of expertise is the sociology of Canadian politics, is currently co-writing an introductory sociological textbook for American university students. In 1995, he edited New Society: Sociology for the 21st Century for the Canadian market.

Six years ago, Brym and colleagues William Shaffir and Morton Weinfeld were editors of The Jews in Canada, a volume which found that the Jewish community is an aging one, resembling an hour glass rather than a pyramid.

Brym has not changed his assessment of the community's future. If it is not augmented by an influx of Jewishly minded immigrants, like the South Africans, the community will most probably decrease in size over the next 50 years, he observed.

Be that it as may, Jews are well integrated into Canadian society, he noted. "Our economic success is enormous, though our political influence doesn't match that of American Jews. We're the wealthiest ethnic group in the country."

The only child of Albert and Sophie Brym, he was born in Saint John, New Brunswick. Brym's father, a tailor from a shtetl near Lodz, found refuge in the Soviet Union after Germany's invasion of Poland in 1939. He toiled in a workers' battalion attached to the Red Army, and arrived in Canada after the war. Brym's mother, on the other hand, immigrated to Canada from Lithuania in the 1920s.

Brym left Saint John, a city he never quite felt at home in, to study at Dalhousie University in Halifax. He received BA and MA degrees from Dalhousie in 1972 and 1973, respectively, and a PhD from the University in Toronto in 1976. Brym joined the U of T faculty in 1978.

He and his wife, Rhonda Lenton, a Winnipegger and a sociology professor at McMaster University in Hamilton, have three children, Shira, Talia and Areilla, who range in age from 6 to 16.

Brym, who spent part of his undergraduate days at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, is one of the founders of Canadian Friends of Peace Now. He remains a card-carrying member, though not an activist.

He believes it is in Israel's interest to accept and come to terms with the inevitable – a sovereign Palestinian state in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

No fan of Benjamin Netanyahu, Brym claims that his term of office constitutes "one of the tragedies of modern Jewish history." As he put it: "Israel was on a course of normalization with the Arab world and the Palestinians, and this stopped with Netanyahu."

Hebrew Benevolent Society to mark 100 years

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — On January 15, 1899, a group of men met at Chasbury Hall at Queen and James streets to debate the merits of forming a sick benefit society.

As reported in the translated minutes of this inaugural meeting, the men unanimously decided to establish a society under the name of the Toronto Hebrew Benevolent Society, which they said, would continue to exist as long as there were seven members.

Yiddish was designated as the official language for meetings and minutes. They determined that members would be entitled to $5 a week for sick benefits or a week of shivah, and that the society would cover funeral expenses for brothers – as members were called then – and family members.

More than 100 years after this historic meeting, the Toronto Hebrew Benevolent Society continues with regular meetings and charity work. On May 30 the society will mark its 100th anniversary with a banquet and dance at Beth Torah Synagogue at 47 Glen Brook Ave.

In an interview, Al Sherman, spokesperson for the society, and a former president, remembered the days when he joined the group back in June 1945, on the advice of his brother-in-law, the late Phil Aiken.

At the time, the group was making the transition from conducting meetings in Yiddish to English. Very few members could take minutes in Yiddish, Sherman explained.

Monthly meetings were held in the Orange Hall, located at the corner of Euclid Avenue and College Street, until January 1958, when the group moved north to a new venue – Beth Habonim on Holiman Road.

The members now have six breakfast meetings a year at the Beth David Bnai Israel Beth Am Synagogue.

He said, in the '40s, bowling was very popular and many people joined the society to play; the bowling league which began in 1934 with a handful of members grew to eight teams.

But he noted that the league no longer exists because many members can no longer play.

Sherman said in the first decades of this century, people joined the societies and fraternities to get medical services.

All the societies had doctors; members would pay them $1 per visit and the society subsidized the rest of the cost, he said. "In the early days, Jewish doctors couldn't go into hospitals. They were connected to synagogues and societies."

The wives of the members joined the society's women's auxiliary. They had had their own meetings, playing bridge at different homes, Sherman recalled.

In 1903, the society purchased a plot of land on Roselawn Avenue for $150, which was used for a cemetery; other cemetery lands at Dawes Road were later acquired as well, he noted.

The society established a brotherly fund in 1904 for those members in dire need or distress, he said. "Many thousands of dollars were given to members. It was always done in a quiet manner. Only a certain committee knew about it. It was never publicized."

Over the years, the Hebrew Benevolent Society has raised money for a number of charitable causes. In 1940, it established the Refugee and Welfare Fund, which supported the Red Cross and other war charities, and the Histadrut, Youth Aliyah, ORT and a variety of Zionist organizations.

The fund also covered the cost of furnishings for a recreation room for Canadian soldiers at Camp Borden.

Some of the many organizations that have benefitted from gifts from the Hebrew Benevolent Society include Baycrest Geriatric Centre and Hebrew University.

Today, Sherman goes to the breakfast meeting with his son Lloyd, where a core group of 30 members attend on a regular basis during the warmer months, he said. There are 140 members, and women of the brothers who have died are welcome at the meetings and 100th anniversary festivities.

Sherman said he is looking forward to the anniversary. "It's going to be a real fun do."

Members on the banquet committee are Wilf Ross, Mel Aiken, Marvin Brown and Lloyd Sherman. For more information about the banquet call 635-6262.

Teen heads USY's social action tikkun olam portfolio

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Nikki Greenspan

TORONTO — Nikki Greenspan's connection with United Synagogue Youth (the youth arm of the Conservative movement or USY) goes back before she was born.

Currently the only Canadian on its six-member international board, Greenspan – whose parents, Vanessa and Stan, met through the organization – is USY's international social action tikkun olam (SATO) vice-president, overseeing 18 regions across North America.

In 1997 she designed SATO's first Web site.

"We raise money for charities and help plan social actions. Some regions are doing drives for Kosovo."

Greenspan is also the USY representative to Sunnybrook Health Science Centre and organized a Chanukah party there last year.

USY has proved to be "exactly what I needed," Greenspan said in an interview at home, pausing every so often to remind Yenta, her large schnauzer, to behave.

"I like the Conservative ideals, and I like the atmosphere," said Greenspan, 18. She also cherishes the friendships she has formed with peers from Nome, Alaska south to Texas and California. "It's a little community."

Although Greenspan, an alumna of United Congregational Schools, is traditional in her observance, she is happy there is room for egalitarianism within the movement. "There's equal opportunity for everybody."

As an international board member, Greenspan is expected to uphold behavioral and religious standards such as Kashrut and Shabbat obervance.

Sometimes people ask her if she plans to "go back to normal" when her one-year vice-presidency ends in December. She had already increased her level of observance before she took on the position, but "some stuff I don't know if I would have been as strong about," she admitted.

"I don't think I'm going to change. I enjoy it so much."

Catching up on her sleep is one advantage to observing Shabbat, she noted. "I run on very little sleep – and I like coffee."

She estimates she devotes at least 20 to 30 hours a week to USY, at the chapter, regional and international level.

A longtime member of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue's youth group, she also served as president of Eastern Canadian region (ECRUSY) – Ontario and Quebec – until recently.

In addition, she's been involved with the Hebrew Culture Club at William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute, where she is an OAC student, and where she organized Holocaust Education Week in 1996 and 1997.

She also serves as an adviser to Beth Emeth's Kadima group, working with 12- and 13-year-olds. "It's a lot of fun," she said.

Being a teenager and working with youth, Greenspan is optimistic about the future. "If you're pessimistic, you won't get anything done," she said.

Around her neck, Greenspan wears a silver and amber Magen David she bought at an open-air market in Poland, on last summer's USY Poland/Israel Pilgrimage.

Her involvement in USY has also taken her to Chicago, New York, Ottawa and most recently Kemptville, Ont. for meetings and conventions.

Next year, Greenspan will be pursuing environmental studies at York University. She hopes to incorporate Jewish studies as well.

Once her term as vice-president is up, she will be past the USY stage, but plans to become involved in KOACH, the campus component of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism.

Students receive honors at JCS awards night

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Prof. Martin Lockshin had some advice for students at Jewish Campus Services' (JCS) fourth annual awards night.

"The time for you to influence people is now," he said, repeating advice he received almost 30 years ago from a former teacher shortly after graduating from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

Jewish students have more credibility than someone who is a "professional Jew," he noted.

Lockshin, associate director of York University's Centre for Jewish Studies, received JCS' Founding Friend of the Campus award for his "unparalleled commitment to Jewish life on campus."

His brief address was met with standing ovations both before and after he spoke. The audience of 150 people at the University of Toronto's University College included about 50 students.

"[Lockshin's] students are much enriched and maybe even a little finer group of people," said graduating student Sharrona Pearl, who also received an award.

Pearl paid tribute to Lockshin's generosity, passion for his work and participation in campus programs.

"He has written tens of reference letters for me, and he always made me feel I was doing him a favor by letting him write them for me."

Lockshin also fought to ensure no classes are scheduled at York University on the High Holidays, Pearl noted.

Lockshin's daughter Chana said her father is "a wonderful father and teacher because he so closely combines parenting and teaching.

"He was my teacher for years before I took a class with him," she said. "In his capacity as an educator, he shows fatherly concern for his students...He truly loves and believes in his work."

The college years are likely the most important Jewish educational years, Lockshin said.

"We probably lose more Jews in the college years when they discover attractive non-Jewish ideas and attractive non-Jewish men and women."

But those students who become attracted to Judaism during the college years often become the most vibrant Jewish leaders, he said.

He finds it a "paradox" that the amount of community money allocated to Jewish education at the university level is relatively small.

Lockshin questioned why campus services are not the highest priority, although he noted the situation is improving.

JCS now receives $406,000 a year (80 percent of its budget) from UJA Federation and recently received a $50,000 grant from the umbrella organization's continuity committee for community college and GAP (graduate and professional) programming.

Earlier in the evening Zac Kaye, JCS executive director, said, "Tonight we also celebrate the furthering of our relationship with UJA Federation...[which] is expressing its confidence in our ability to deliver an outstanding campus program."

But the "sad problem" of the campus community, according to Lockshin, is that UJA Federation "generally believes in micromanaging budgets and making sure every penny of community money is spent in what they consider to be a reasonable way."

At the same time, JCS "believes in allowing students to make decisions about programming. Students do not take marching orders from the establishment," he noted.

"To me it makes perfect sense that students should run their own show," he said.

Martin Lockshin

Noting the imbalance of power in professor-student relationships, Lockshin said he feels "touched and honored that students sometimes allow me to take part in their activities. It's fun to work with students outside the classroom, and it's important work."

JCS Campus awards went to Tammy Weisz (Ryerson Polytechnic University); Shay Aba, Elise Levinoff and Jason Weshler (York University); Alex Greenberg, Leora Kesten, Sara Werb and Zahava Rosenberg (University of Toronto).

Citywide awards were also presented: Tau Omega chapter of AEPi (The UJA Federation Action Committee for Jewish Continuity Award for Enhancing Jewish Identity and Continuity); Carolynn McLean Schwartz (the Jacobovici Family Award for Arts and Culture); Judith Peranson (the Canadian Jewish News Award for Communication); Igal Hecht and Oren Cohen (The Gropper Family Award for Outstanding Leadership); Sharrona Pearl (The Paisley Manor Insurance Brokers Inc. Award for Special Involvement in Jewish Campus Life); Janice Elster (The Sidney Mednick Memorial Award for Building Pluralism and Diversity); Tally Wolf (The Nechama and Ya'akov Kaner Award for Creative Programming); Mark Buzaglo (The UJA Federation of Greater Toronto Award for Chesed and Social Justice); Sandy Benayon and Ellie Richmond (The JCS award for Ongoing Commitment to Jewish Student Life).

Speakers also included JCS board president Jack Zarek. Elli Mandel, chair of JCS' citywide social committee, opened and closed the program.

York University graduating student Sam Stone, who served as emcee, designed the awards. "One day they're going to be worth something," said Kaye.

Israeli, Canadian educators forge new partnerships

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A formal delegation of Israeli Education Ministry officials made its way across Canada this month to study Jewish education here and to seek new ways to forge partnerships.

But besides the hasbarah value of the 2½-week trip, participants said it also produced concrete ideas that could translate into action.

In Quebec City, the group met with top bureaucrats from the education and international affairs ministries, and according to Felix Melloul, director of the Association of Jewish Day Schools (AJDS), they were told that the province might in future consider underwriting student exchange programs for public school students.

"The ministry indicated it wants to bridge the gap with Israel," Melloul said.

But Amnon Shinar, director of United Israel Appeal (UIA) Canada in Jerusalem, stressed that while such public support would be welcome, the primary focus of the visit remained to create stronger links between Jewish educators and students in both countries.

"The idea is to have co-operation in two fields: teacher training and curriculum development," Shinar said. "The key words are mutuality and partnership."

"There are now 20 schools in Israel 'twinned' with 20 schools in Canada, and there's no more money," Shinar said of the approach to the Quebec government. "We've reached a stage where Jewish community resources are not enough."

That sentiment was echoed by Yitzhak Tomer, the group's leader and the Israel Education Ministry's superintendent of the Southern District.

"We start at this point and expand the relationship to public schools," he said, "and you need a real budget to run such a program."

"We are convinced, after visiting Montreal," Tomer said, "that there is a real basis for creating relationships with this community," a move that's already underway through a planned pilot project involving teacher exchanges.

"We found out we can learn a lot from each other," he said.

The latest trip was the natural outgrowth of a twinning process that began years ago with Project Renewal and evolved into Partnership 2000 programs to counter long-held perceptions, Shinar said.

Toronto launched a program two years ago, called Living Bridges, which saw its own and Israeli educators enter discussions and implement exchange programs with Israeli schools that saw students from both countries interact at a much more basic and human level.

Such efforts have produced enhanced curriculum development, better teachers in both Canada and Israel, and stronger Jewish identity and identification with Israel at an earlier age.

"After two years, we saw that this model worked," Shinar said, and that led to the Israel Education Ministry being approached to sponsor the formal visit by ministry officials, by far the most ambitious to date.

Shinar jokingly called the trip, Canada 101, as they were also scheduled to visit Ottawa, Toronto, Winnipeg, Calgary and Vancouver, before returning to Israel May 12.

In Montreal, the group appeared impressed with what they saw and heard.

"We were very surprised at how Jewish identity is so strong and deep and unique here," said Simcha Shneor, deputy director-general of Israel's Education Ministry and director of its development department.

"During all our meetings here, we got the feeling that each party really wanted to know each other and to strengthen the relationship between the two educational systems."

Coast to Coast

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

We now return to our occasional series on the current state of the five political parties represented in the 36th Parliament. In the first instalment, we looked at challenges facing the natural governing party (a.k.a. the governing Liberals). Our attention now turns to the official opposition, the Reform party, which must confront some daunting challenges of its own.

Later this month, the Reform party will undertake a membership-wide referendum on the option of assuming a new identity, the United Alternative (UA).

Two-thirds of the national caucus has pledged its support to the UA option. This should not be surprising given Preston Manning's position in favor of redefining, or to use his words, "broadening the access and appeal" to the essential Reform agenda. However, it is surprising. In fact, everything about the UA initiative is surprising once one tries to wed certain developments with basic Reform principles.

Firstly, accurately reflecting the desires of one's constituents is a fundamental tenet of the Reform party. Almost everyone concedes that UA proponents will not secure the double majority needed to carry the day. If one factors into the equation that the majority of support for the United Alternative is within the Ontario wing of the party, how can all those western MPs buck the will of their constituents?

Secondly, for all intents and purposes, Manning has tied his leadership to the success of the United Alternative. He believes that Reform will be doomed as a regional party unless it can "woo" Ontario, and understands that at its current levels, Reform support in Ontario will not translate into seats in the House of Commons. If the UA initiative goes up in smoke, Manning will burn with it. Looking at the damage to his credibility caused by his flip-flop on Stornoway, back-tracking on the UA will propel Manning beyond rehabilitation.

The irony of this saga is that if Manning is finished as leader, Reform is likely finished as a credible force on the federal scene. That scenario could very well prove the necessary catalyst for the emergence of a new "party of the right" which could ultimately achieve the cross country unity that has eluded Preston Manning for the last decade.

Mitzvah Marketplace is held in Ottawa

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Jewish community needs to reach out to those in need of help, said Chuck Rotenberg, a panel member at the second annual Mitzvah Marketplace, a program about volunteering in the community, sponsored by Agudath Israel Synagogue.

The panel discussion, entitled Coping with Change throughout the Lifecycle, also featured social worker Shoshana Kagedan, who discussed the impact of divorce on children and families; Dr. Marcia Zuker, who does geriatric assessments at the Ottawa General Hospital; and Maxine Stata, program co-ordinator at St. Luke's Lunch Club, a drop-in centre for homeless men, women and children.

Stata pointed out that "some people view homelessness as a characteristic, rather than a situation one finds oneself in."

She spoke of how circumstance or an unhappy twist of fate can render one homeless, either temporarily or chronically, and urged the audience to open their hearts and minds to those less fortunate.

Participants were invited to browse through the Mitzvah Marketplace where organizations had booths to display their wares.

Scouts Canada, the Cancer Society, the Children's Aid Society, Jewish Family Services and the Good Companions Seniors Centre were among a host of groups that had volunteers on the spot to discuss their work.

Co-chairs of the event were Yaffa Greenbaum-Shinder and Marion Mayman.

Netanyahu campaign unravels at the end

By YOSSI VERTER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's strategy collapsed completely on the weekend.

The withdrawal of Yitzhak Mordechai and Benny Begin from the race for prime minister pulled the rug from under Netanyahu's feet.

Twenty hours before the polls opened, he found himself facing the doomsday scenario in its full horror: head to head with Ehud Barak, with an almost impossible gap to bridge in the polls, and without the prospect of a run-off vote.

Netanyahu built his whole campaign on the premise of a second round in which he hoped to be able to inject a combative spirit into his troops, win back those who were disappointed in him and deprive Barak of Arab votes.

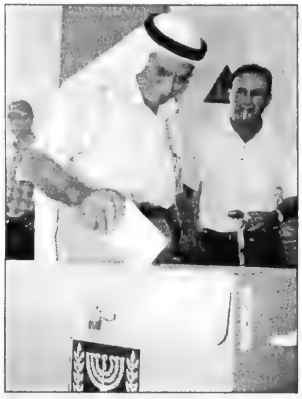
There was only one problem: There would be no run-off without the help of Netanyahu's two bitter rivals, Mordechai and Begin.

Netanyahu discovered that the desire to topple him overcame even Mordechai's stubbornness and Begin's ideology.

In his press conference Sunday, Mordechai explained he had learned only that morning what everyone else had known for months: the polls ruled him out as a viable candidate.

He gave the impression of not believing what he himself was saying.

Flanking Mordechai were Amnon Lipkin-Shahak and Dan Meridor. Both had turned down offers of senior positions from Barak. Both had thought that only Mordechai could win big.



An Arab-Israeli votes in Taibe.

The most dramatic election campaign in Israel's history reached the finish line with an astonishing balance of forces. The leader of the Labor party went into the election with the support of most of the former Likud leadership: David Levy, Mordechai, Meridor and Roni Milo.

Even from his wheelchair, Mordechai Rozental votes in Ra'anana.

Much had even been said about Ehud Olmert's contribution to Barak's campaign.

Also backing Barak were three retired popular generals whom Netanyahu had courted: Yossi Peled, Matan Vilnai and Doron Rubin. Netanyahu had only Brigadier General Amal Assad on his side.

As the nightmare turned into reality, Netanyahu convened one of the most bizarre press conferences ever held in the Prime Minister's Office.

Besides three ministers, a few former activists of the Centre party, whom Netanyahu said were returning to Likud, sat behind the prime minister. One of them wore a pink cardboard sign on which he had penned, "I'm coming home."

It looked like an end-of-year play in a third-grade class at a school with meager means and no vision.

Barak had hoped to garner half of Mordechai's votes and a third of those who were undecided. To consolidate his victory he needed a high turnout among the Arabs.

He also hoped that the Russian voters had told the truth to the pollsters. Barak's American advisers, particularly Stanley Greenberg, predicted a lopsided victory.

Netanyahu hoped for a miracle, and miracles, as we know, do happen.

But this one required a last-minute awakening in Likud, the return home of all those who defected to Mordechai, a dramatic reversal among the Russians, a mysterious epidemic in the Arab towns, and a total failure of the poll predictions.

Cultivating opportunities for peace

By GIL TROY
Special to The CJN

When May 4, Yasir Arafat's "sacred day," passed with no declaration of Palestinian statehood, most Jews sighed with relief.

Commentary

Those on the left, hailed Arafat's discipline; he refused to endanger the Oslo accords and guarantee Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's re-election. Those on the right, celebrated the end of Oslo's five-year interim period and another Palestinian retreat.

There was a farcical, emperor-has-no-clothes element to this statehood declaration crisis. For like it or not, the Palestinians already have a state. But, even worse, this pinched, tactical, legalistic, too-clever-by-half approach to Oslo – from both the left and the right – is shameful and telling. And it will continue, irrespective of the outcome of this week's election in Israel.

It reflects our overall failure, in Israel and abroad, to embrace what may have been an extraordinary opportunity.

For years, Zionists yearned for peace – publicly, flamboyantly, promiscuously. Whether we sang Oseh Shalom – He who Makes peace – in the synagogue, or the hipper Shir LaShalom – song for peace – on the beach, we united in our peace fetish. "If only we had someone to negotiate with," we mourned. "If only the Arabs yearned for peace as intensely as we do," we sighed. "Ach, those Palestinians, they never miss an opportunity to miss an opportunity," we sneered.

Then along came Oslo, abruptly, surprisingly, miraculously. Seemingly overnight, we would negotiate with our fiercest enemies. Arafat, the murderer became a "moderate," the "peacemaker."

From the start, Oslo was an ugly agreement. It was messy, ambiguous, complicated, with too many pages, too many stages, too many maps, and too many unanswered questions. It rapidly became an ugly peace, as the healing image of Bill Clinton shepherding Yitzhak Rabin and Yasir Arafat into their awkward but sincere handshake dissolved into the heartbreaking images from the buses of Jerusalem, from the streets of Tel Aviv, of twisted metal, charred flesh, massacred commuters, murdered schoolchildren.

With the bombings, and with Rabin's assassination, extremists on both sides prevailed. Bad enough to leave something as precious as peace to politicians, abandoning it to fanatics was sinful. The history of the last five years proves that evil is singular, good plural. One single individual can do great harm, while good can only be sustained if it is mass produced.

Unfortunately, even with such sobering mathematics, many of us fiddled while Oslo fizzled. How many Jews – in Israel or the Diaspora – did anything to make the peace work? Who among us lifted a finger to plant this peace in the grassroots, to nurture a workable reconciliation between neighbors, rather than an awkward ceasefire between enemies? Few Israelis approached individual Palestinians, while we in the Diaspora simply parroted the left-right debate. Few of us, there or here, did anything to "bring peace upon us and on all of Israel," as the prayer hopes; or "let the sun rise, the morning enlighten," as the song pleads.

After Oslo, five years ago, many Jews believed that the Palestinians had to bring peace to us. We said if they wanted to jump up and down in their jalabiyahs and call for jihad, holy war, the bloodshed would continue. However, if they calmed down and found common ground, the peace might work. In putting the onus on them, we waited for them to fail, we may have helped create a self-fulfilling prophecy.

True, Arafat continued to speak with his forked tongue, talking peace in English, and jihad in Arabic. He whispers sweet nothings into Clinton's ears and breathes fire to his people. True, their side repeatedly violated the letter and spirit of the agreements. True, their extremists began the violence. And true, real strength comes from geopolitical realities, not group hugs.

Still, all but the most zealous of rejectionists will concede that the last five years would have been different had the peace brought dramatic social, cultural, and economic changes.

The Netanyahu-Arafat minuet would look very different against an elaborate lattice of friendships, exchanges, investments. Yet, few of us tried to transcend the past; most remained imprisoned by hostility or passivity. Most Israelis were wary – justifiably; most Diaspora Jews were disengaged – understandably.

In waiting for "the peace" or the Palestinians to bring something to us, rather than going out and forging new facts on the ground, one of the great breakthroughs of the 1990s did little to change the status quo.

Even if our sins have been sins of omission, not commission, we, too, have failed. Bobby Kennedy was right. By not being part of the solution, we became part of the problem. Few of us were zealots for peace, few embraced it, nurtured it, indulged it; those who did, most of us dismissed as starry-eyed peaceniks. We treated Oslo like a piece of paper to quibble about, rather than the chance for peace between peoples we craved.

Now we have something else in common with the Palestinians – besides a passionate attachment to the same, small, sacred piece of real estate. These days, alas, it seems that both Jews and Palestinians rarely miss an opportunity to miss an opportunity.

The time has come for all of us to start cultivating opportunities for peace, whoever wins the election.

The Week in Israel

May 10

• Israeli police recommended that charges be brought against Avigdor Lieberman, controversial Russian-born candidate for the Knesset and former aide to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. An investigation was launched last month after a newspaper quoted Lieberman as describing police investigators as "anti-Semitic racists" whose place was "in jail, and not as wardens."

May 11

•The High Court of Justice delayed implementation of a government order to close three offices at Orient House, the Palestinian Authority's de facto headquarters in eastern Jerusalem. The ruling came on a petition filed by an Israeli peace group. The court gave the state and Palestinians one week to explain why negotiations aimed at resolving the dispute over the offices had failed.

• The Central Election Committee requested that a list of all citizens who died during the past three months be distributed at polling stations to prevent election fraud Monday.

May 12

• The rabbinic leadership of the Shas party endorsed the candidacy of Netanyahu for re-election. (The leaders of Degel Hatorah and Agudat Israel – the United Torah Judaism bloc – subsequently endorsed the prime minister as well.)

May 13

• Fighting in south Lebanon claimed the lives of eight people, five of them Lebanese civilians and two members of Hezbollah. Four of the Lebanese civilians were killed by a roadside bomb planted by the radical Islamic group and one by Hezbollah shelling that had been aimed at Israeli army posts in Lebanon.

May 14

• The IDF Northern Command was reportedly making a major effort to prevent its ally the South Lebanon Army from taking revenge on Hezbollah after an SLA fighter and four members of his family were killed yesterday by the roadside bomb.

Auschwitz dispute continues

By MICHAEL JORDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

OSWIECIM — A proposed zone of "peace and silence" that would encircle the site of the Auschwitz concentration camp was anything but peaceful and silent last week.

Last week on Sunday, a windy, overcast afternoon, two dozen Polish Catholics gathered defiantly to pray and sing before nearly 300 wooden crosses, planted adjacent to the camp that many Jews refer to as the largest Jewish cemetery in the world.

The crosses are just beyond – but clearly visible from – the camp's notorious Block 11, known as the Death Block for the years of torture and executions carried out there.

A day earlier, President Aleksander Kwasniewski signed a bill into law that would set up protective zones around Auschwitz and other former Nazi death camps in Poland.

The law, which would enable the government to remove the crosses, came into force as Polish leaders hope to end a bitter dispute that has further strained relations between Poles and Jews – and caused strife within the Catholic Church itself.

The timing of the bill's signing is not surprising, coming ahead of a visit next month by Pope John Paul II. It may be the ailing pontiff's last trip to his homeland.

For three years, a number of Jewish groups have fought against the use of any religious symbols at the camp. Some hailed the law as forcing the removal of all the crosses.

"This is a bill we were looking for," said Miles Lerman, chair of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum's council.

Yet the law is worded ambiguously, raising questions as to what it truly means. Indeed, the law may allow for one cross to stay – the so-called "papal cross" that sparked the controversy in the first place.

Such a move reportedly has the support of Polish Prime Minister Jerzy Buzek – a Protestant said to be leery of being branded anti-Catholic.

As a result, Rabbi Avi Weiss, the leader of the Coalition for Jewish Concerns – Amcha, described the law as "a terrible defeat for the Jewish community."

He has long decried the "Christianization" of Auschwitz, and said it would be "an absolute outrage" for the towering, 24-foot cross to remain.

So it is unclear how Polish officials will carry out the new law.

Complicating matters is Kazimierz Switon, the militant who initiated the cross-planting campaign last August.

Switon camps out at the site in his beige caravan, chatting with his cohorts under a large blue and white tent.

He refuses to budge, and has even threatened self-immolation if the crosses are removed.

But his rhetoric is less patriotic and religious than it is anti-Semitic.

In an interview with CNN last August, Switon said, "Jews cannot tell Poles what to do."

He declined an interview with JTA last week. However, this controversy is more than a simple case of deep-seated Polish anti-Semitism.

Though the scene of unparalleled Jewish suffering, Auschwitz – Oswiecim in Polish – also resonates with Poles, said Joachim Russek, director of the Judaica Foundation in Krakow.

It is well known that for Jews, Auschwitz is a searing symbol of the Nazi genocide. Of the 1.5 million who perished at Auschwitz – and nearby, at the Birkenau death camp – at least 90 percent were Jews.

Often forgotten, however, is that in 1940 the Germans converted the compound, a former military barracks, into a concentration camp specifically for Polish prisoners. Tens of thousands of Poles – perhaps as many as 70,000 – died there, as well as Russians, Gypsies and others.

Today, these crosses are said to commemorate the site – an enormous pit, actually, now covered over with grass –where the Nazis executed an untold number of Poles.

"What we have at Auschwitz is a dramatic clash between two collective memories, and not enough knowledge of the experience on either side," said Russek, who is not Jewish.

"What is so painful is that in a place of so much tragedy, you have competition between two categories of victims. And Jews clearly were the more numerous victims."

Collective memories aside, the case of the "papal cross" is widely viewed as an anti-Jewish provocation.

It began in 1979, when Pope John Paul II made his first trip home. The large cross was erected for a mass he held at Birkenau, which was attended by 300,000 Poles.

It was then dismantled and stored in a local parish.

Meanwhile, in 1984, a Carmelite convent was installed flush against the Auschwitz camp's northeastern wall, across from Block 11. By 1988, Jewish groups were pressing for the convent to be relocated. It was then that the large "papal cross" reappeared and erected next to the convent as a sign of resistance.

Though the pope never presented it as a cross given to his followers, it quickly became known as the "papal cross."

U.S. criticizes Iran

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iranian President Mohammed Khatami last week hailed the Hezbollah guerrilla group as an "ideological and humanitarian movement" that is trying to liberate Lebanese territory from Israeli occupation.

Khatami's remarks came after a meeting with Hezbollah Secretary General Sheik Hassan Nasrallah in Damascus, a day after the Iranian leader pledged support for Palestinians opposed to the Middle East peace process.

Khatami's meeting with leaders of militant Palestinian factions, and his strong support for continued resistance against Israel "worries" the United States, said Martin Indyk, the U.S. State Department's envoy to the Near East, in an interview with the Lebanese daily As-Safir.

"It is hard not to conclude that Iran is still strongly opposed to the peace process, and backs these organizations that adopt the policy of violence against the process," the paper quoted Indyk as saying yesterday.

Washington has made cautious overtures to Iran following the May 1997 election of Khatami, who represents a new, more moderate strain of politics in Tehran. His election prompted a series of tentative feelers on both sides, but President Bill Clinton's offer to engage in a dialogue has been rejected by Tehran.

In the As-Safir interview, Indyk criticized Iran for failing to respond adequately to the U.S. overtures.

Khatami met yesterday with Nasrallah under tight security at the Iranian Embassy in Damascus. Iran provides Hezbollah with arms, as well as financial and moral assistance.

Hezbollah is "an ideological and humanitarian movement that seeks liberation and independence," Khatami said in remarks carried by Iran's official Islamic Republic News Agency.

The Iranian president also met yesterday with a senior Shiite Muslim Lebanese cleric, Grand Ayatollah Mohammed Hussein Fadlallah, who is widely thought to be Hezbollah's spiritual guide. He also held talks with Lebanese Druze leader Walid Jumblatt and Lebanese members of parliament.

Before leaving for Saudi Arabia, Khatami held separate meetings with Syrian President Hafez Assad and Assad's son Bashar.

The two leaders spoke about strengthening relations between their two nations and the Middle East peace process, among other topics. They did not speak with reporters following the meetings.

Israeli feminist lays down the law on women's issues

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

RAMAT GAN — Deemed by her university as the "protector of women's rights in Israel," Ruth Halperin-Kaddari, a member of Bar-Ilan University's (BIU) law faculty, is laying down the law on women's issues.

A feminist and family law expert, Halperin-Kaddari is the author of an in-depth report to the United Nations (UN) – which she was commissioned to write – concerning the Implementation of the United Nations convention on the Elimination of all forms of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW). She is now working on turning this report into a book. But what she really wants to see, is to see it translated into Hebrew.

"It hasn't been translated yet into Hebrew which is a big problem, because many people here just don't use English," she said.

Supposedly, there's a budget to turn it into Hebrew, but as Halperin-Kaddari acknowledges, she has yet to be approached about it. And she is already working on a followup report to be submitted to the UN next year.

Halperin-Kaddari has expectations for the UN report, Israel's first national report on the legal and sociological standing of Israeli women, in terms of improving the lot of women in Israel. But her expectations are not outlandish. She is aware that each step towards progress counts.

The establishment of the National Authority for the Advancement of Women, for example, is one step in the right direction. In her UN report, she referred to the establishment of this authority. It is now a reality. But while it has been realized, Halperin-Kaddari says with a hint of disappointment in her voice, that it is lacking a sufficient budget –"an ongoing story with women's issues in Israel" – and is therefore not functional yet.

"Women's issues are being taken more seriously, but when it comes down to the actual allocation of money, it stops. I can't say things have dramatically changed," she said in an interview in her Bar-Ilan University office.

Ruth Halperin-Kaddari

"Women's issues are at the bottom of the political and legal rung in Israel," she said. "In order for women to achieve genuine equality in the workplace and at home, the law must not only be reformed, but must also be enforced."

As for combatting violence against women, one of the many issues Halperin-Kaddari deals with in her report, is the recent, high-profile Galili case, in which a young woman successfully petitioned the courts to halt promoting Galili to chief of general staff after charging him with rape. This would suggest there is a severe crackdown going on. But, as Halperin-Kaddari explains, because there is no one group responsible for implementing the laws, smaller groups are forced to make their own decisions without any precedents.

"Although it seems a lot of action is going on [in terms of combatting violence], the bottom line is there's no progress."

As for the Galili case, Halperin-Kaddari said: "We should be grateful for the woman...this time the woman won."

Other areas Halperin-Kaddari would like to see improved in the near future, include progressive laws such as discrimination and pay equity in the workplace. "We have beautiful laws," the youthful mother of three boys said. "They're just not being implemented."

But Halperin-Kaddari is not one to back down from obstacles. The daughter of Bar-Ilan University Prof. Menahem Zevi Kaddari, who is the winner of the 1999 Israel Prize for Hebrew Linguistics, Halperin-Kaddari comes from an intellectual background. With a law degree suma cum laude from Bar-Ilan University, she received her LLM and JSD from Yale Law School. It was her expertise in family law from the feminist perspective that attracted the attention fo the Israeli ministries of justice and foreign affairs, which commissioned her to write the UN report.

And her expertise doesn't stop there. Halperin-Kaddari also co-heads BIU's new interdisciplinary graduate program in bioethics, philosophy and law. She recently helped organize a conference on organ transplants, relating to the legal aspects of the determination of death.

"Since the major Jewish religious law authorities maintain that brain death (rather than cessation of heart activity) is the determining factor in setting the moment of death, there is actually no contradiction between organ transplant donation and Halachah," Halperin-Kaddari explained in BIU's Scholar magazine.

She is looking forward to her trip to Toronto later this month, where she will give a series of speaking engagements that conclude with a lecture open to the public at the Shaarei Shamayim Synagogue, on Tuesday evening, May 25.

From Toronto, Halperin-Kaddari is off to Chicago for another conference and then will return to Israel to co-direct a June conference at BIU on the problem of the Agunah in Israel and abroad, and a July conference involving the forum of Religious Women in Israel.

By the number of books piled along the walls of her office and on her desk, and from the numerous telephone calls that peppered this interview, it would seem that Halperin-Kaddari never rests. At least she has a 12-hour flight to Canada.

Multifaith artists present Bible's Song of Songs

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Shula Saltzman and the Me'irim Dance Company.

TORONTO — From the very beginning of history the Song of Songs, an ancient collection of love poetry in the Bible ascribed to King Solomon, has inspired artists of many faiths and in a variety of disciplines, says Cyril Greenland. "And it continues to be a source of inspiration for artists."

The retired professor of social work says he "was excited" by the Song of Songs when he read it as a teenager and he found the text very comforting when he rediscovered it in the 1970s. This lifelong interest in the ancient poems spurred him to organize a multifaith and multi-faceted presentation of the Song of Songs by local performance artists of Jewish, Christian and Arabic heritage.

The event will be presented by the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (JCC), the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) and Trinity St. Paul's United Church next week.

The downtown performances will take place at Trinity St. Paul's, 427 Bloor St. W. on May 26 at 8 p.m. and May 30 at 3:30 p.m., and the uptown show will be held at the Leah Posluns Theatre, 8 p.m. on June 2. The May 26 opening gala night is being sponsored by the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews.

The program featuring Jewish, Christian and secular interpretations of Song of Songs, culminates in the world premiere of a new dance work performed by choreographer Shula Saltzman and her Me'irim Dance Company.

They dance to Shir Hashirim, a cantata by Toronto composer Milton Barnes. He will be guest conducting the members of the Chamberworks Players, a female chorus, along with vocalists, soprano Renee Bouthot and Cantor Benjamin Maissner, tenor.

Renee Bouthot

"This is the first time it's [Shir Hashirim] been choreographed," Barnes said "I'm really excited about it. It will be a very interesting presentation."

Three leading choirs perform on different days: the Toronto Chamber Choir conducted by David Fallis (May 26); the Trinity St. Paul's Choir, led by Brad Ratzlaff (May 30); and the Lachan Choir, led by Maissner (June 2).

Their repertoire of songs inspired by Song of Songs, spans 500 years, and among the pieces performed will be the world premiere of My Beloved's Garden, a choral work by 23-year-old composer James Moffett, who won the Song of Songs Young Composers Competition.

Other performers include musician and ethnomusicologist George Sawa and the Traditional Arabic Music Ensemble and Dancers, along with choreographer Dahlia Obadia who will re-enact the Shulamite Wedding Dance; actor Yanna McIntosh will dramatize the biblical text.

Choral work

Project coordinator Harriet Wichin, said she has been working on the Song of Songs presentation for more than two years, getting song rights and funding and managing the budget.

"It's rare that artists of Jewish, Christian, and Arabic heritage come together to celebrate procreation and love and sensuality. All these are universal themes explored in the Song of Songs," she said.

The first half is a complete dramatic reading by two actors of the Song of Songs as a love poem or dialogue between lovers; interwoven in the dialogue will be a selection of interfaith choral compositions in Hebrew, English, Latin and German.

The highlight of the first part is the Shulamite Wedding Dance, she said.

"George Sawa is very knowledgable about the origins of Semitic music. He's very enthusiastic about the project."

Choreographer Saltzman also served as Judaic consultant on the project, translating the Hebrew text and working with the pronunciation of the Hebrew with some of the choirs.

"The project has evolved over two years. It's been an exciting exchange of ideas," she said. "It's almost unbelievable that we're so close to a performance date. It's really such an incredible experience. We've shared so much and grown so much."

In addition to the above mentioned organizations, funding for this program also comes from the Ontario Arts Council, Edward Bronfman Family Foundation, RBY Scott Music Trust of Emmanuel College, Toronto Arts Council, the Laidlaw Foundation and the Toronto Community Foundation: For Toronto, For Good.

Israeli 'legend' to star in show for disabled veterans

Dudu Fisher

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — It is fitting that David (Dudu) Fisher, star of this year's Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel, Beit Halochem Canada's fundraising concert, began his singing career in the Israeli Defence Forces, entertaining the troops.

The 46-year-old singer and cantor, who has gained international acclaim, and performed for Queen Elizabeth II and the Royal Family of Thailand, will perform at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts Recital Hall on May 27 at 7:30 p.m in a concert titled The Legend in Real Life – Dudu Fisher.

David Krivoshei, an Israeli composer and musician, will be accompanying Fisher.

All proceeds from the concert will be allocated towards upgrading and modernizing the Beit Halochem centres in Tel Aviv, Haifa, Jerusalem and Nahariya which offer state-of-the-art rehabilitation facilities for over 48,000 disabled war veterans and their families.

Fisher, who hosts a prime time Saturday night television show in Israel, has recorded 14 albums and two video cassettes, and has starred in two movies.

He has performed with the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra conducted by Zubin Mehta.

Born in Petah Tikvah, Israel, he attended Nahalim yeshiva. After completing his army service in 1973, he studied at the Music Academy of Tel Aviv University and went on to sing mostly cantorial music. He was made cantor at Tel Aviv's Great Synagogue.

Fisher has become one of Israel's premiere cantors. He has won top honors in The Chassidic Festival, the Yiddish Festival and the Festival of Jerusalem, among others.

While visiting a cousin in London, England in 1987, he attended a benefit performance of Victor Hugo's Les Miserables. "I cried throughout the whole show."

He auditioned for the play, which was about to open in Tel Aviv, and performed the title role of Jean Valjean in the Hebrew version. It became the biggest hit of all time.

He later performed the role on Broadway and in London, England's West End.

Often described as "a performer with a voice of an angel," Fisher says that when he sings in the show, he sings from his heart. "It is exactly the same as when I'm standing in front of the Ark."

Fisher has recorded modernized versions of old Yiddish songs his grandmother used to sing to him, translating some of them into Hebrew for the youngest generation of Israelis.

Tickets for the Dudu Fisher concert range from $50 and up, and a tax receipt will be issued to the maximum amount allowable. For more information and tickets, call Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel, Beit Halochem Canada, 787-8950.

Documentary film guilty of the sins it ascribes to media

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The documentary Blacks and Jews, shown at the recent Jewish Film Festival here, is guilty of exacerbating tensions between these two groups, which is the very sin the film accuses the media of committing.

Opinion

Its ace in the hole is a reunion between a West Indian journalist and a Jew he helped save during the Crown Heights riot in Brooklyn in 1991.

The film shows a New York Post front-page picture of a Jew lying unattended. The picture helped its sales. The paper neglected to say anything about the later intercession of the black.

This film is good journalism, but in making the reunion the focus of its treatment of the Crown Heights riot, it does what the New York Post did, but in reverse. The reunion scene skews the film in favor of the blacks.

No doubt film-makers Bari Scott, Deborah Kaufman and Alan Snitow were motivated to bring greater understanding to a difficult problem. But in working with only the people who would support their point of view, they are guilty of the same sin as all media.

The deeper tensions in Crown Height and the causes of the riot there are never explained.

Included in the film is coverage of a 1995 incident at an Oakland California theatre: 67 students from a high school were thrown out of the theatre because they were laughing or hooting at scenes of Jews being executed in Schindler's List.

By giving inordinate exposure to the views of the black and Hispanic students, and almost fawning treatment of producer Steven Spielberg, who spoke in the high school auditorium, the film-makers do what they say the national media does – they blow the incident out of all proportion without really explaining why it happened.

Journalistically, it's interesting that the students said they didn't know what the Holocaust was about, and that they didn't even know the history of the slave trade. However, there were no interviews with the Jews who were at the theatre. They were outraged by the students' actions.

This segment absolved the blacks, but, by omission, cast doubt on the Jewish perspective.

The portion that dealt with Jewish landlords exploiting black home buyers in Chicago also went overboard in the attention it paid to the radical rabbi who had teamed up with the blacks.

Again, the film's point of view was that the Jews were in the wrong. Many Jews would agree with this, and my guess is that they do more to improve black-Jewish relations than this documentary.

The causes of black-Jewish tension is so complicated, and so far from a resolution, that any media (read documentary) attempt to resolve it, is in trouble from the start.

Merry Widow waltzes into LPT

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Student Intern

TORONTO — A mainly Jewish cast is performing Franz Lehar's operetta, The Merry Widow, at the Leah Posluns Theatre in North York. The show opened May 14 and runs to May 23.

The Alexander Singers and Players have been together for over a decade under the direction of Angela Hawaleshka, who named the community theatre company after her late father.

"He loved Gilbert and Sullivan," says Hawaleshka, a singing teacher, whose roster of pupils has included Cantor Benjamin Maissner of Holy Blossom Temple.

She says the company's first production, Trial by Jury, a half-hour-long operetta, was performed in the church basement where the company members now rehearse.

The Merry Widow is one of Hawaleshka's favorites; the waltzes, and the unusual Can-Can will appeal to all ages, she says.

More than half the cast is Jewish, including David Rosen, a graduate from York University with a BA in Judaic Studies. Rosen has been recently accepted to a cantorial school in New York.

"This is one of the best community theatre companies and I'm going to miss it," Rosen says.

He describes his experience in the company (he played Perchik in Fiddler on the Roof last year) as familial. The atmosphere is very comfortable, he says.

Hawaleshka stresses that, during auditions, anyone can join the company.

"We've had children as young as eight and seniors in their mid-70s."

She is not rigid when she assigns roles to actors, she says. "I look at who they are, look what is natural to them and then I try to draw the real person into the character."

The cast includes actors in a range of days jobs, among them, an opthamologist, a lawyer and a retired librarian.

Often family members join together. In this production, Gwyneth and her husband Vincenzo Cestito star opposite each other as the Merry Widow and Camille.

Curtis King plays Count Danilo and the choreography is done by Gillian Katz and Ceris Thomas.

The Merry Widow details the story of a beautiful woman who is left with an enormous fortune after her husband dies on their honeymoon. The plot thickens as she becomes the sought-after prize among eligible men. The last scene climaxes with the famous Merry Widow Waltz.

The 12-year-old company often donates a portion of ticket sales to charities such as the Arthritis Society and ORT Canada. This spring the company is supporting Variety – the Children's Charity of Ontario and Casey House Hospice.

The Alexander Singers and Players have performed such Gilbert and Sullivan productions as HMS Pinafore, The Mikado (twice), The Pirates of Penzance and Broadway musicals Oklahoma and Fiddler on the Roof.

Concert blends styles

BY SHIRA HONIG
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Cantor Yaakov Motzen, founder and leader of the annual Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue cantorial concert, and Shaarei Shomayim's chazzan, wants to make cantorial music accessible to a wide and often dubious audience.

Last year, the concert's focus was almost solely cantorial. This year, in Motzen's effort to make the show on May 26 at 8 p.m. more exciting and diverse, there will be a blend of cantorial, chassidic, Yiddish, operatic, choral and even Broadway tunes.

"If I'm doing a cantorial concert, I should be singing cantorial songs," Motzen says he has been told, "but there's nothing wrong with doing other music. If you bring music to the people, you have to make sure they enjoy it. You should not give up the quality of the singing."

With the world-renowned Motzen joined this year by Cantor Israel Rand from the Hampton Synagogue and Cantor Shlomo Simcha Sufrin of Shaarei Shomayim, who are both stars in their own right, it's unlikely that the quality of the music will be compromised.

The three cantors, who have performed with top musicians around the world, will sing in Hebrew, Yiddish, Italian and English, sometimes singing alone, and at other times accompanied by the Shaarei Shomayim adult choir and Cantor Daniel Gildar on piano.

But even with all this diversity, cantorial music will still reign supreme.

"I try to do everything," says Motzen. "But cantorial should be the main [thrust of the concert], so that people can be educated [and understand] that it is not something that they need to be afraid of. By attending more of these performances, people will become more appreciative."

Motzen should know – after all, he's been doing these concerts successfully in Montreal for years. When he moved to Toronto with his family a little over two years ago, he brought his idea with him.

Joyce Eklove, a big fan of Motzen's and the co-chair of the concert committee with David Freudmann, says this is a new opportunity for Shaarei Shomayim to share Motzen with the rest of the community.

The targeted community includes both Jewish and non-Jewish people across Toronto. The concert committee hopes to have an audience as diverse as the music itself.

So if you didn't go last year, make sure you go this time round. To appreciate opera, you don't need to understand Italian. And to appreciate cantorial music, you don't need to be a shul member.

To buy tickets for the May 26 cantorial concert at Shaarei Shomayim ($50, $36 and $18), or to advertise in the concert's commemorative journal, call 789-3213.

NEW BOOK OFFERS MORE YIDDISH FOLK SAYINGS

You'd think that Shirley Kumove, compiler of two eminently readable books of Yiddish sayings, would have a word for every occasion, but when asked to single out one or two favorite phrases from the thousands she has collected, she demurs like a mother asked to identify her favorite child.

Kumove's Words Like Arrows came out in 1984. Its follow-up, More Words, More Arrows, appeared this spring (Wayne State University Press). Kumove, a Toronto native who was raised in a Yiddish-speaking home, didn't start learning English until she began kindergarten in the College-Bathurst neighborhood.

She started collecting delightful little Yiddish adages, aphorisms and pithy observations nearly a quarter-century ago, she recalls. "At first I collected them on scraps of paper and put them into a shoebox. When the shoebox became full, I had to decide how serious I was about continuing this."

Many people, hearing of her hobby, would bring her Yiddish expressions that had been spoken in their families. Kumove has also spent much time in scholarly research. Now, having already published about 2,400 sayings in the first two books, she has collected as many again. She is seeking a publisher for a third volume.

"We always talk about Jews as being the people of the book," she says. "But Jews are also people of the word, because Yiddish culture is oriented towards speech."

A founding member of the Friends of Yiddish, Kumove is also a translator of poetry and short stories. She has translated the poetry of Anna Margolin, and is working on a memoir of Pua Rakovsky, a Polish-Jewish woman who founded secular Hebrew schools in Poland.

Isn't there one saying that she particularly likes? "You want me to choose one phrase?" she asks. "But there are so many here that are worthwhile. Okay, here's one – it's a comment on marriage."

She offers it first in Yiddish: "As tsvey lign oyf eyn kishn, zol a driter nisht mishn tsvishn." In other words: "When two on a pillow are fixed, a third should not mix 'twixt."

Like its predecessor volume, More Words, More Arrows instantly illuminates the rich culture from which it is derived. The sayings are filled with equal measures of cleverness, wisdom and humor. They are translated with finesse.

A man iz vi an enger shukh — khotsh es drikt dokh, muz a vayb im trogn. A husband is like a tight shoe — even though it pinches, a wife must endure it.

Az men antloyft fun a brenendik hoyz, shtelt men zikh nit op kushn di mezuze. When you flee a burning house, you don't stop to kiss the mezuzah.

Tsvey mol a yor iz shlekht dem oreman: zumer un vinter. Twice a year the poor are badly off: summer and winter.

Toronto Jewish Film Society: American Matchmaker, a 1940 American-made Yiddish-language film by director Edgar Ulmer, combines musical interludes and stock comic characters from Yiddish theatre with qualities of the urbane romantic comedies that Hollywood made during the Depression.

The screening is accompanied by the short I Want to be a Border, in which a husband and wife seek release from marital bickering by pretending to be landlady and tenant.

Rubber-limbed Leo Fuch's classic song-and-dance routines are the high point of both films, which are co-presented with Friends of Yiddish.

All proceeds of this solo concert go to the public school attended by two of his six grandchildren. Coincidentally, it was on the same stage at Forest Hill Collegiate that Bram made his show-business debut. Tickets $12. 870-8000 or 393-1633.

Children's Concert No. 2: Recording artists Judy & David, who bill themselves as "the hot new stars of the Canadian children's music scene," perform with the All Together Now Band. $9.99 to $36, plus GST. Ford Centre Recital Hall, Sunday May 30, 4 p.m. 870-8000.

•"The leatherback sea turtle is literally a living dinosaur. They survived the ice age and the cataclysmic event that wiped out the dinosaurs. Yet they may not survive us," says Toronto-based writer-director Barri Cohen.

Photographers see things from unique perspectives

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Seeing Things, the current exhibition of Canadian contemporary photography by nine artists, held at Marcia Rafelman Fine Arts, and running to the end of May, features black and white, color, mixed media and computerized photographs.

The exhibition, part of Contact 99's 3rd annual photography exhibition, includes Canadian artists, Steven Evans, Motty Levy, David Cowles, Fred Langer, Linda Rutenberg, Nir Bareket, Mats Nordstrom, Alan Davis and Steve Eprile.

Evans is one of Canada's most acclaimed contemporary photographers. He has exhibited his works at the Art Gallery of Ontario, Harvard University Graduate School of Design in Cambridge, Mass., and in Europe.

On exhibit, is a selection of works entitled, City of Rooms. These large format black and white photographs explore a series of forgotten, abandoned or merely hidden interior spaces around Toronto.

Evan's photographs range from the legendary RCA Harris Water Filtration Plant to the deserted Old Don Jail. Suffused with light and rich detail, these quiet images are both descriptive and interpretive.

Levy's photo essay, From Heron to Jerusalem, focuses on the diverse population and the paradoxes involved in living in either of these two cities.

"As a former Israeli photojournalist, and as a man who grew up in this area, I wanted to get a close up look at the people in the heart of the conflict between Israelis and Palestinians."

Levy's photo essay, From Hebron Jerusalem because of the extreme positions taken by some of the people living in both of these cities.

The photographs taken in Hebron include the Jewish settlements and religious sites, as well as the Muslim neighborhoods, including the Arab marketplace. The shot locations in Jerusalem include the Muslim, Jewish and Christian quarters and some other interesting neighborhoods in Jerusalem including the haredi section of Mea Shearim.

Cowles, who made a series of trips to North Africa between 1993 and 1997, documented remaining Jewish historic sites – synagogues, cemeteries, and shrines – in Morocco, Egypt and Tunisia.

He says he wanted to photograph these sites before they disappear completely as the communities move elsewhere.

A relative newcomer to the art community, although he has been photographing for many years, is Fred Langer, a medical doctor.

Langer, who recently won several awards from The Canadian Association of Photographers and Illustrators in Communications, says that he has been devoting more and more time to photojournalism, photographing people in their day-to-day struggles.

Langer went to Cuba to photograph the people. He explains that by using a small, light range-finder camera, and natural light, wide angle lenses, no props and fast black and white film, he could engage his subjects, and be a presence in the ultimate image, yet not be obtrusive.

His portraits take place in the context of their struggle against poverty, symbolized by the decaying European baroque buildings that give the appearance of time having stopped 40 years ago.

Montreal photographer, Rutenberg, has successfully been able to use infrared film in the context of black and white photography. The iridescent properties of the infrared film provide her landscape images with an ethereal quality, suggesting an esthetic tranquillity unique to her work.

Israeli-born Bareket, who served as chief photographer of the Israel Museum in Jerusalem, and made his home in Toronto in 1975, has included a very personal, introspective series of photographs that explore the juxtaposition of the nude against the skyline of Toronto.

Motty Levy's Street Musicians in Central Promenade.

His photographs are achieved on-site, with the model herself at various different locations throughout the city.

Nordstrom's series, Devices of Temporary Control, emerged from an interest in how humans organize themselves and the essentials. Starting with sinks and plumbing, it envelops steering wheels and train stations, and a host of other devices invented to simplify our lives.

Davis exposes his photo images onto silver leaf coated canvas and arches paper through a series of visual explorations. The silver leaf highlights of his work suggest a luminous property found only in early tin type photographs. Combined with the textural elements created by the overlapping of the silver leaf, Davis's images assume an almost painterly quality.

Eprile, a forensic handwriting specialist and lawyer, who recently changed career paths to become a full-time photographer, has several landscapes – abstract water scenes – and Eprile seeks out the true color forms in nature.

The exhibition can be viewed by appointment, call 920-4468.

Women face greater addiction problems

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO – To recover from an addiction, the addict has to do more than merely stop taking the substance say two addiction therapists with the Donwood.

"Recovery is about making changes, and people don't change easily. Refusing to take the substance is probably the easiest thing in the process of recovery," Barbara Shapiro and Barb Farkas said recently at a panel discussion about women and addiction sponsored by Holy Blossom Temple Sisterhood.

Someone abusing a substance, said Shapiro, is usually totally out of touch with their feelings. "Gambling, over-eating, drugs or alcohol can all alter one's feelings. Recovery means starting to learn about these feelings."

Addictions are very complicated, she said, and doctors are often not trained to deal with them. "They often medicate their patients instead of helping them get in touch with their true feelings. A lot of people are raised to think that whatever a doctor prescribes must be okay. There is a gross misconception about all medicine being okay."

When women do go to a doctor, she said, it is often just to talk, not to deal with their addictions. "Women will go to doctors to talk much quicker than a man, but men will deal with their substance abuse faster than women. That is because there is more shame for a woman to be an addict. Women are not supposed to drink or take drugs - especially Jewish women."

That is why, she said, it is difficult for Jewish women to seek help for their addictions. "I have seen women lose everything. Pulling their lives together takes a lot of work, and some people just have to hit bottom before they start seeking help."

There are biological, psychological and social reasons why people become addicts. "Women's lives are complex, and they often use substances as a coping strategy. They may drink in isolation just to cope with life. Not every addiction is a crisis. There can be very high functioning people who no one would ever guess are addicts."

The pair talked about a composite family in which the father was an alcoholic, the mother took pills in order to cope, and the daughter was depended upon to keep her father from embarassing the family. "The daughter, who had a family of her own, felt a lot of pressure to take care of everyone, and she had no outlets. She was beginning to take pills herself, and started to fall into her mother's patterns."

Addiction does not happen to one person, said Shapiro. "It happens to a family, and when it does happen, everyone juggles to get back into balance. The daughter was the one responsible for keeping the family in balance."

They said that the first step a woman should take in seeking help for an addiction is speaking to someone she can trust, such as a family doctor. "If he is not familiar with addiction, then he is not for you, but he may help you find someone else. Once you start making calls, you're starting the process of recovery. You are aware that something is wrong."

New diabetes treatments

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Student Intern

TORONTO — New drugs and an artificial pancreas may give suffering diabetics new hope, says Dr. Robert Silver of Toronto Hospital, Western Division.

Silver spoke on New Hope in Diabetes Research at the Canadian Diabetes Association's Jewish chapter meeting held recently at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

Although new drugs are still being tested, Silver, a diabetic for 34 years, said a form of insulin that is inhaled may find a place in the market in the future. The drug, developed by pharmaceutical company Pfizer, will allow the diabetic to inhale insulin in powder form. Since the lungs cover a large area, more insulin will be absorbed than when it is injected.

When Silver suggested the possibility of an implantable artificial pancreas, some of the audience snickered. Silver smiled and admitted it sounded like "something from Dr. Spock."

He explained that three components are necessary. "We need an insulin pump, a blood glucose monitor and a control system to tell the pump when to administer insulin."

He said that the artificial pancreas is designed to deliver insulin to the liver, not to the bloodstream, in order to regulate blood sugar levels. A ring on the finger will give a readout of the glucose level 24 hours a day. If the level does not fall in a normal range, it will emit a signal to modify the pump.

"It's not perfect," Silver said, adding that it may not be available for months or even years, "but it is being feverishly worked on."

A new drug that may help diabetics who do not react well to insulin is Troglitazone, which sensitizes the body's response to insulin, he said.

Diabetes affects five to 10 percent of the population. It results from insulin deficiency and is characterized by high blood glucose concentration. It is the most common cause of blindness in adults over 20 and is the leading risk for heart attack, stroke and limb amputation, Silver said.

Everyone should understand and recognize the risk factors: obesity, high blood pressure and high cholesterol, and having a close relative with the disease. Certain ethnic groups (African-Americans, aboriginals, Hispanics) seem to have a higher than average rate of diabetes, he said.

Sixty to 80 percent of diabetics are controlled by oral pills; 20 to 30 percent are controlled with insulin, which chases the sugar out of the blood.

Diabetes can cause eye and kidney disease and may result in severe damage to the central nervous system.

"Weight control, exercise and early intervention can prevent progressive diabetes," Silver said.

Many diabetics ask, "What's the guarantee to have quality of life free of complications?" he said, adding that with the improvements of new technology, things are looking hopeful.

Israel & the Jewish World

Israel marks rocky 50 years of membership at UN

By JULIA GOLDMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

UNITED NATIONS — Israel commemorated 50 years of rocky membership at the United Nations by giving the world body a symbolic gift.

At a brief ceremony in the UN's towering headquarters in New York, Israel's foreign minister presented Secretary-General Kofi Annan with a stone from a fourth-century synagogue in the northern Galilee.

The stone "only emphasizes the uninterrupted Jewish existence for thousands of years in the land of Israel," Ariel Sharon said in a speech that stressed Israel's nationhood, making only tacit reference to the United Nations.

In the years since the UN General Assembly admitted the fledgling nation into its ranks on May 11, 1949, Israel has faced almost continuous challenges by a majority of the UN's 185 member-nations to its policies and even the ideology supporting its existence.

In what many consider to be the nadir of Israel's UN status, the assembly, led by the Soviet Union, resolved in 1975 that "Zionism is racism." The resolution remained on the books for 16 years before it was repealed.

Israel is regularly singled out at the United Nations, and Arab-Muslim member-states virtually ensure the passage of anti-Israel resolutions. Only the United States regularly votes in Israel's favor.

"Criticism of governments is nothing new" at the UN, said Felice Gaer, the director of Jacob Blaustein Institute of the American Jewish Committee.

"But the relentless focus on Israel has really been unparalleled," Gaer said.

Still, Gaer, who has been observing Israel at the United Nations for 30 years, said in an interview that she sees some subtle indications of progress and improving civility toward Israel at the United Nations, which she attributes in large part to Annan's leadership.

At the ceremony marking Israel's 50-year milestone, it was Annan, generally regarded as a friend to Israel, who touched on the Jewish state's turbulent UN history.

Israel "has a home here at the UN," Annan said, "I know at times it has not seemed like a home."

Of all of the 185 UN member-nations, Israel alone is prevented from belonging to a regional group, and is thereby precluded from election to the security council, among other significant committees.

So far, even the West European and Others Group – which includes others as far-flung as Australia and New Zealand – has denied Israel's entry.

Speaking at an anniversary dinner last week attended by Israel's first UN representative, Abba Eban, and former U.S. Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, Annan said Israel could "do much more" for the UN if it belonged to a regional group. He reiterated a pledge he made last year in Jerusalem to encourage a solution to this "anomaly."

The United Nation's most recent inhospitable act came in February, when the General Assembly voted in favor of an Arab-sponsored resolution to convene an international conference to discuss Israeli construction plans for the Har Choma neighborhood in eastern Jerusalem.

If convened, the July 15 meeting would be the first-ever gathering for any reason of the parties to the 1949 Fourth Geneva Convention, which governs the treatment of civilians during wartime.

"The parties have never met in all these 50 years of the existence of the convention," the director of UN affairs for B'nai B'rith, and a 30-year UN veteran, said.

"Look what's happened in Kosovo, but because Jews are building homes in Jerusalem, that's why they want to meet," said Harris Schoenberg, who attended the gift-giving ceremony.

Israeli Ambassador to the United States Zalman Shoval, UN Ambassador Dore Gold, and Consul General Shmuel Sisso attended the ceremony, and UN representatives of several Arab, African and European countries looked on.

The Presidents Conference, an umbrella organization of Jewish groups, received a letter from President Bill Clinton denouncing the Geneva conference as counter-productive "in that it would both damage the peace process and politicize the practice of humanitarian law."

In the April 1 letter, Clinton also said he raised the issue with Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat.

Presidents Conference chair, Malcolm Hoenlein said the Presidents Conference is launching a "worldwide campaign" to educate international leaders about the issue. He said Jewish leaders had met with officials from Greece, Nigeria, Azerbaijan and Pakistan.

The implications of the unprecedented Geneva meeting are unclear, said Hoenlein in an interview. It could "become a forum for 'Zionism is racism' in a 21st-century form."

Annan reportedly held a "very constructive" meeting with American Jewish leaders early this week to discuss their concerns over the Fourth Geneva Convention and the Palestinians' increasing reference to UN Resolution 181 as a source of Palestinian sovereignty.

Last month, the UN Human Rights Commission passed a resolution supporting the Palestinians' right to self-determination based on that resolution and Resolution 194, which calls for the right of return for Palestinian refugees.

Also known as the 1947 Partition Plan, Resolution 181 proposed dividing British Mandatory Palestine into a Jewish and an Arab state, with Jerusalem under international control.

In the past, such support was based on UN Security Council resolutions 242 and 338, which call for the exchange of land for peace and for negotiating recognized borders. These resolutions served as the basis for the Israeli-Palestinian peace process.

With these storm clouds looming on the United Nation's horizon, Annan called for a "new climate" of co-operation between Israel and the United Nations based on their shared values of "freedom, democracy and tolerance," and shared goals of "peace, security and an end to fear and upheaval."

Speaking moments after he and Sharon together removed the dark blue cloth to reveal the stone from Kfar Yasif – which bears carved Jewish symbols, including a seven-branched menorah – Annan drew parallels between Israel's mission to be "a light unto nations" and the United Nation's role as "a torch of peace, freedom and human rights."

Many member-states have made similar gifts to the UN headquarters. Israel's stone now stands on a pedestal facing Iraq's 1977 gift, a pillar depicting the code of Hammurabi from 1792-1750 BCE.

Just across the hallway is the corridor that leads to the chambers of the economic and social committee – which Israel is ineligible to join.

Budding soccer star pursues pro career in Europe

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sam Hazan's father, David, has always known young Sam was a phenomenal soccer player.

Back when he was 12 and spending a vacation in Israel, he was good enough to train with Maccabi Haifa's youth team for two months. The coach of the team was so impressed, he tried to persuade the family to let Sam remain in Israel and play with the team full time, but David figured his son was still much too young for that.

Then there was the time two years ago at the JCC-Maccabi Youth Games in Connecticut when 14-year-old Sam scored 13 goals in five games – a Gretsky-esque total in a sport where a 2-1 score is a goal-fest.

Last year he was selected to the Ontario provincial team and in July, he helped his club team, Glen Shields, win a national championship. His pivotal role on the team turned a few heads among national team scouts, who invited him to the national youth team for kids 16 and under.

Impressive enough, but most revealing was the interest in Sam shown in England, where soccer is, if not quite a religion, at least a national passion on par with Canadians' love of hockey.

With the help of his uncle, Ben-Zion Hazan, who lives in England, Sam got a tryout with the Watford Soccer Club's junior squad, a 2nd Division team in London. He didn't look out of place on the team and eventually, he attracted the attention of coaches and scouts at Arsenal, the English Premier Division's prestige team – the Montreal Canadiens of English soccer.

From January to March, Hazan, 16, laced up his cleats two or three times a week and worked out with the Arsenal's assortment of top young soccer players. Those talented players are on a fast-track for a pro career in England. To use a Canadian hockey analogy, they were the major junior players of England.

So how did he fare compared to that group?

"I competed quite well against them," Hazan said while on a recent visit home.

Unfortunately for Hazan, his Canadian citizenship proved a stumbling block to his dream of one day playing in an English professional soccer development league. Although Watford and Arsenal were both interested in Hazan playing for them, he did not possess the work permit that would allow the teams to sign him.

Training and practices for a limited three-month period were all he was permitted to do and following his return to England recently, he began a similar process with Wimbledon, another London team.

Sam Hazan

A British player agent eventually placed Hazan with Auxerre, a premiere division youth development team near Paris.

At five foot 11, 150 pounds, the centre/midfielder boasts good control of the ball and a thundering, left-footed shot – hot commodities for soccer teams everywhere.

One of his ex-coaches believes Hazan has what it takes to eventually play pro ball in Europe. "He's very technical. He's very good with the ball," said Dave Benning, technical director for the Glen Shields Soccer Club. "He can see the game; he has lots of vision."

Benning rates Hazan in the top 10 percent of players in his age group in Canada and one of only a handful (six from the Glen Shields soccer factory) pursuing their soccer dreams in Europe. Hazan has the potential to develop into a national team player for Canada and his future will depend on how well he copes with the tougher brand of soccer played there.

"It's a physical game in Europe," Benning said. "You have to play with the ball fast and move it very quickly because they're quick to tackle you....Sam has the quickness and to win the ball back, you have to be tough."

Although there have been suggestions from Canadian coaches that he pursue a U.S. athletic scholarship, Hazan preferred the European track.

"Watford and Arsenal have professional coaches who played at the big club and they have five of them on each team," Hazan said. "To be famous and a star in the future, you have to be in England or France."

Hazan doesn't think he's being unrealistic in setting his sights on a career in the European pro ranks. "With what I've seen so far, I can withstand their (his fellow players') level and even go farther than them," he said.

A fallback position for Hazan would have been to continue his career in Israel, where he was born and where he still has family. There are four Israeli pros playing in the European leagues – two in England and one each in Spain and France, but staying in Europe would be his best route to a professional contract, he said.

One of those Israeli pros, Ronnie Rosenthal, formerly of Maccabi Haifa, helped get him his chance at Watford.

After his three-month training period lapsed, a lucky break got him a tryout with Arsenal. His gym coach, who happened to be an Arsenal scout, saw him play and recommended him to the big team. Sam would have preferred to remain in England, where he could live with his uncle, keep kosher and play lots of soccer, but he'll be happy playing in France, which plays the tactical, passing game he enjoys.

"It's exciting to be at that kind of level," he said. "It's what I like. I would love to go play soccer every day."

Concert honors Jerusalem

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A lively cantorial concert, presented by Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, marked the 32nd anniversary of the reunification of Jerusalem.

A standing room only crowd enthusiastically cheered, clapped and sang along with the performers, Beth David Chazzan Yehuda Rottner; Sidney Dworkin, cantor of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim in Montreal; Chazzan Yair Subar, now cantor at Beth Sholom Synagogue in Ottawa; and Ukrainian-born Chazzan Itzhak Zhrebker, cantor of Congregation Shearith Israel in Dallas, Tex.

The concert conductor and arranger was Stephen Glass, director of music at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim. He led a small orchestra that served as an effective and enhancing backup to the performers, although one might wish they had resisted the urge to jazz up O Canada until the audience had to struggle to figure out what they were playing.

The concert switched between songs sung as solos, duos, trios and quartets. Subar offered a tender, movingly lilting version of Y. Green's Y'Simcha Elokim, while Dworkin shone with Sol Zim's Avinu Shebebashamayim.

Zhrebker, thanking Louis Danto, former chazzan of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Congregation, for introducing him to chazzanut during a visit to Russia, sang an aria in his honor in the bel canto style for which Danto is well-known.

Rottner, the guiding spirit for the concert, the eighth annual Yom Yerushalayim Festive Concert of Song and Joy, as it was titled, exuberantly sang, pumped the air, and pulled the others into impromptu dances.

Most exciting were the medleys of songs, one about Jerusalem, highlighted by Ani Ma'amin and Mashiach; one of Israeli songs, with a masterful harmonizing version of Hinei Matov; and a toe-stomping collection of tunes for the concluding prayer, Adon Olam.

Bill Dunn, a founder of now-defunct synagogue Beth Am, and an active supporter of Beth David and many communal causes, was honored with a special plaque, presented by synagogue spiritual leader Rabbi Philip Scheim, and another from Toronto mayor Mel Lastman and the city council, which was presented by Judy Sgro.

Barak reaches the summit

Shas wins record number of seats

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Ehud Barak winning the premiership by a landslide was not the main topic Israelis were talking about days after the election. Neither was the fact that Likud nearly halved its Knesset seats. What everyone was talking about was Shas.

"I was thrilled [Barak won]," said Chana Cohen, a retired Jerusalemite. "But I went to bed thinking it was a landslide, and I woke up to find out Shas had so many seats."

Cohen's sentiments were shared by many. "I was shocked that Shas got so many votes," said Ora Berg also of Jerusalem.

In fact, Shas itself was surprised at its success. The party – formerly led by Aryeh Deri, who in March was convicted of taking bribes during his tenure as Interior Ministry director-general and then as interior minister – won a whopping 17 seats, only two fewer than the Likud.

Deri stepped down as head of the party the day after the elections.

"I hope Barak doesn't form a coalition with Shas," said a municipal worker who didn't want to give his name.

But Barak may do just that. Although he does not need Shas to form a coalition, the Israeli press hinted the One Israel leader would ask Shas, now that Deri is no longer its head, to join him in order to have a wider spectrum of Israel in the government.

Meantime, Barak's victory was a celebration for all of Israel. In his speech at Kikar Rabin in Tel Aviv, Barak reiterated that he wanted to be a "prime minister for all of Israel."

In an open letter to Barak, Yedioth Aharonoth reporter Nahum Barnea wrote, "The victory that you won in the elections was stunning by all measurements. But more than it demonstrates that the nation wanted you, it demonstrates that the nation rejected [Benjamin] Netanyahu. It rejected him because of his character, because of his behavior as a person, and because of his identification with extremist groups. Yesterday, it was permissible to celebrate Netanyahu's mistakes. Today, you must learn from them to be a different prime minister."

Aryeh, a cab driver and Likud supporter, agreed with Barnea's words. "I voted for Barak because I didn't want [Netanyahu]. But I don't really want Barak either."

During the campaigning leading up to the elections, signs and stickers declaring Just Not Netanyahu is further proof that Barak's policies were not the only thing on the minds of voters who elected him. The vote at the ballots was less a vote of confidence for the new prime minister, than a vote of no confidence against the out-going prime minister.

Hagit, a Hebrew University student, was one of those campaigning against Netanyahu. "I'm glad he didn't win," the Meretz supporter said, adding that she will keep the hat, T-shirt and posters she has with the slogan.

Rabbi Bulka Honored

OTTAWA — Rabbi Reuven Bulka, spiritual leader of Congregation Machzikei Hadas for the past 32 years, will receive the Gilbert Greenberg Distinguished Service Award for 1999. The award, named for the late president of the city's Vaad Ha'ir, is the Ottawa Jewish community's highest honor. The formal presentation will be made at the community's annual meeting, scheduled for June 2.

ISRAEL

Settler Leader Quits

JERUSALEM — Jewish settler leader Pinchas Wallerstein resigned as chair of the Settlers Council last week, saying Jewish residents of the West Bank bore responsibility for the fall of the government of Benjamin Netanyahu.

Housing Project Begins

JERUSALEM — Israeli construction firms have started preparations for building homes at a controversial Jewish housing project in a southeastern Jerusalem neighborhood. Initial groundbreaking at Har Choma in March 1997, led to a nearly two-year suspension of Israeli-Palestinian peace talks.

WORLD

Israel Visit Considered

WASHINGTON — The White House is exploring the idea of a late June visit to Israel by first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton and the Clintons' daughter, Chelsea. The first lady, who skipped Israel on a recent Middle East visit, promised to visit after the Israeli elections.

Probe Of Banks

NEW YORK — Chase Manhattan Bank and Jewish groups reached an agreement last week aimed at settling charges that two of the bank's branch offices in France froze Jews' wartime accounts before the Nazis ordered them to do so. The agreement calls for an independent probe of the branches' conduct and possible payments to former Chase customers.

Lawsuit Against Boss

NEW YORK — Lawyers for Holocaust victims filed a lawsuit against German clothing maker Hugo Boss for its use of slave laborers during World War II. Allegations against the company, which made uniforms for the Hitler Youth and the German Army during the war, first surfaced in 1997. The suit, filed in New Jersey, also named several new companies that have not been targeted by previous similar lawsuits.

Jews Polled on Israel

NEW YORK — Some 42 percent of American Jews think Israel "should be willing to compromise on Jerusalem's current status as a united city under Israeli jurisdiction," according to a survey released last week by the American Jewish Committee. At the same time, 66 percent agreed that the "goal of the Arabs is not the return of the occupied territories, but rather the destruction of Israel," according to the survey, in which 1,000 American Jews were polled.

Chapel At Auschwitz

WARSAW — A wooden hut set up near the former Auschwitz death camp to protest government plans of removing hundreds of crosses from the site, was consecrated as a chapel earlier this month. Church officials refused to approve the chapel put up by Kazimierz Switon, the militant who initiated the cross-planting campaign last August. The Polish government recently passed a law that will enable it to remove the crosses.

Swiss Banking Lessons

ZURICH — Switzerland should always remember the lessons it learned from its Holocaust-era banking debacle, the country's first Jewish president said here this month.

"Switzerland isn't some extraordinary country which managed more than any other to look after the security of its own people and to carry out impeccable humanitarian actions," Ruth Dreifuss told an assembly of the Swiss Confederation of Hebrew Congregations. "But it would also be wrong to say that Switzerland actively supported Nazi Germany."

PM, Jewish Groups, Congratulate Barak

OTTAWA — Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and Canadian Jewish groups have extended best wishes to Israeli Prime Minister-elect Ehud Barak on his commanding victory.

Chrétien congratulated Barak in a letter in which he also reaffirmed Canada's support for the peace process. The prime minister also said he's looking forward to getting acquainted with Barak.

"We salute the Israeli expression of true democracy," said PMO spokesperson Sophie Galarneau.

Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) chair Brian Morris said Barak "is faced with a number of daunting challenges. As Israel approaches the final status phase of negotiations with the Palestinians, he will have to balance the need to pursue peace with the need to ensure the personal security of all Israelis."

Canadian Jewish Congress president Moshe Ronen wished Barak "wise counsel and good fortune as he meets the challenges of leadership in the coming term." CJC also acknowledged Benjamin Netanyahu, hoping the defeated prime minister"will continue to contribute to the growth and development of Israel."

B'nai Brith Canada leaders wished Barak well, adding that "now is the time for the Jewish people to unite to support a strong and vibrant Israel, with Jerusalem as its undivided capital."

Israeli election day focus of community forum

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A community gathering on Israel's election day was treated to a "scoop" when an Israeli journalist reported that Ehud Barak's incoming One Israel government plans to implement the Wye Accord and kick-start the Arab-Israeli peace process.

Using "private channels," Barak has told U.S. President Bill Clinton and Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat that Israel will implement Wye and follow that with a summit meeting in Washington involving the three leaders, Shmuel Segev said in a telephone hookup from New York.

Though Barak plans to relaunch the peace process quickly, expect many years before a final agreement is reached, Segev said.

"Barak will not make the slightest move if it decreases Israel's security. For him, Israel's security comes right at the top of his agenda."

Segev was among several telecommentators who joined others on hand live at the Lipa Green Building. They briefed about 100 people on the strategic, political and social repercussions of Barak's landslide election victory last week.

The event was jointly sponsored by UJA Federation, Canadian Jewish News, B'nai Brith Canada, Canadian Jewish Congress, Canada-Israel Committee and Canadian Young Judaea.

CJN columnist Shira Herzog dismissed the notion that the election was a referendum on the peace process. Instead, she said, Israelis voted on the questions of "leadership, character...and the norms of government."

The voters' message to Israel's political leaders is to "be credible, have integrity and character," she said.

Voters also told their elected officials they want to see the peace process continue but to be tough negotiators; in addition, the vote shows public discontent with outgoing Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's tactic of fomenting division, she said.

Barak received "a strong, clear mandate from within the Jewish population...No one can accuse him of being prime minister of only part of the people."

The election result, with its fragmentation of parties, left Barak with "choices in forming a coalition for the first time since Begin in 1981," added Herzog, who serves as vice-president of the Kahanoff Foundation.

Barak will face difficult negotiations over Jerusalem, West Bank settlements, water rights, refugees and a possible Palestinian confederation with Jordan; however, the incoming prime minister has set out clear "red lines" that he will not cross in final status negotiations, said David Goldberg, director of research and education with the Canada-Israel Committee.

Barak's red lines include:

- Jerusalem will remain under Israeli jurisdiction;
- Israel will not return to its pre-1967 borders;
- no Arab army will be allowed west of the Jordan river;
- Israel will retain settlement blocs in the West Bank.

Goldberg said Barak has adopted Netanyahu's views of "reciprocity and mutuality." Everything is negotiable, as long as the Arabs reciprocate, Goldberg said.

Barak has pledged to remove Israeli troops from Lebanon within one year, but doing so depends on the pressure the United States can bring to bear on Syria and whether Syrian President Hafez al-Assad is willing to make a deal, Goldberg said.

Barak will enjoy a "brief honeymoon period" with Egypt and Europe, but that will be tested when talks with the Palestinians experience their "first bump," he said.

Examining the social implications of Barak's election, Prof. Michael Brown of York University's Centre for Jewish studies said the prime minister-elect has attempted to "set a new tone and reach out to various groups in Israel." The party name, One Israel, indicates Barak realizes the need to heal divisions within Israel.

Barak placed prominent Sephardim on the One Israel electoral list and he has made the historically secular Labor party more tolerant of religious groups, Brown said.

He suggested that many Diaspora Jews who saw Israel as an "Orthodox enterprise" will now renew their interest in the country.

In a telephone hookup from Israel, commentator Barry Rubin of Bar-Ilan University's BESA Institute, said Shas, a Sephardi, religious party, increased its presence in the Knesset, but lost its control of important government ministries.

Other religious parties will have to do serious soul searching to determine whether they want to participate in a One Israel-led coalition government, he said.

THE SIX BIGGEST MISTAKES PEOPLE MAKE WHEN MANAGING THEIR INVESTMENTS

As Canadians, we should be spending more time thinking about investments and tax strategies.

Most Canadians spend too much time worrying about their RRSP portfolios and not enough time thinking about their overall investment strategy. Remember, your RRSP is limited to $13,500 and if you are in a pension plan, your maximum is even less.

Here are some of the biggest mistakes people make when managing their investments.

5. People don't always take advantage of the methods available to legally avoid taxes.

Legal loopholes are kosher. Honest. They offer wonderful windows of opportunity for tax relief. Always remember that money denied to Revenue Canada is just as sweet as money earned. There are many financial constructs you can use to legally avoid paying taxes: Trusts, Tax Shelters, RRSPs, Limited Partnerships, The Dividend Tax Credit and the lower levels of taxation applied to Capital Gains are just a few.

6. Too many people speculate with their life savings.

While being too conservative can significantly decrease your purchasing power, people who jump into risky investments in the hopes of outlandish returns often speculate with money they can ill afford to lose. A better investment strategy is to hedge your portfolio. If you choose to place a portion of your "nest egg" in an intelligent, aggressive investment – make sure your investment portfolio is balanced by a safer growth-oriented investment; this way potential losses will never cripple your portfolio's ability to grow. It would be far too simplistic to listen to blanket statements like "the tortoises always pass the hares" or "never enter into a risky investment". There are times when you feel you need a more aggressive component in your portfolio. Just remember to hedge your bets and you are a winner even if you lose.

Stretching creativity

With the conclusion of the Israeli election, I will use this space, at least this week, to write about something other than politics.

Specifically, I will write about some of the achievements of our college and university students.

The time of year lends itself to doing so.

The post-secondary academic year has finished. Students have written their exams and submitted their final essays. They await their marks. Some await graduation in a matter of days.

As readers of The CJN, and of this column in particular, know, it is a matter of very high priority with us to encourage our students to stretch creatively their curiosities and their imaginations, to write, to paint, to draw, to give expression to the stirrings of their soul.

To help foster this creative spirit, we like to publicize, whenever possible, some of the outstanding student works.

Among those outstanding works is Dorot, an annual journal of contemporary Jewish literature organized by students, for students.

This year, Dorot published its fifth volume.

Sponsored by Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto, itself a beneficiary agency of UJA Federation, Dorot is a unique and precious instrument which enables our campus-age children to follow the muse of Jewish expression.

The editor in chief of volume five was Carolynn McLean Schwartz. Her staff on the journal were Barbi Price and Shira Honig. It contains prose and poetry by students from Toronto, British Columbia, New Brunswick, New York and Israel.

In an introductory editor's note, Schwartz respectfully and endearingly pays tribute to the founding members of Dorot: Sidura Ludwig, Dave Gordon, Janna Nadler and Lenny Cohen, all of whom, "have moved on to different projects... and are sorely missed."

She boldly and directly explains the mission of Dorot to be "a creative outlet for Jewish work."

The staff of the journal are to be commended for their selections and for the final product. The works are, generally, thoughtful, imaginative and tenderly written.

I reproduce one of the poems from the volume, I Regret, by Elana Levine, to enable our readers to judge for themselves, the high quality of our children's achievements.

Lavine's poem is evidence of an inquisitive mind and a thoughtful, mature sensitivity.

That she feels part of the chain of Jewish history is apparent in the very subject of the poem.

That she was able to articulate that feeling of connection in a relatively small number of words, is further proof that she and our children, are doing good things on campus.

I Regret

by Elana Levine

If I could travel space and time
Future, foreign, would not tempt me.
My destination: Siedlce, 1930.
Why visit outer reaches, or talk with Einstein?
I would like to meet my Zaidy, young and tall.

Siedlce, 1930: where my cousins were as numerous as the stars.

Three companions for a lunch date
From any era or land, they ask me.
Medical school interviews, 1998
He did not make the final cut for my reply
I said Da Vinci, Osler, and Anastasia.

And so, having sacrificed truth for my career,

I would like to ask for an afternoon
In the town where my chromosomes
Were carried by others

Da Vinci could have painted my eyes,
But in Siedlce, someone had them.

1930, Siedlce: where my family tree is lost in Polish forest.

There will be travel required
But surely lodging is provided
At the house of the woman
For whom I am named.

Please reply.

To all college and university age students, we extend our wishes for a safe and rewarding summer.

Keep on writing.

Reform welcomes Barak victory

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ehud Barak's electoral victory was welcomed by a Reform leader, who said the prime minister-elect has always been supportive of religious freedom in Israel.

Barak has shown more "courage" on this issue than any other leader in Israel's history, said Rabbi Eric Yoffie, president of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations (UAHC), the leading lay Reform organization.

Rabbi Yoffie was on a whirlwind visit to Toronto to congratulate the Canadian Reform community on establishing Camp George at Parry Sound, the first Reform summer camp in Canada, and the first kosher Reform camp in North America.

The results of the Knesset election were not available to Rabbi Yoffie when he was interviewed by The CJN, but the size of Barak's victory as prime minister led him to say that Barak would form a coalition government "without any IOU's to the religious parties."

The Reform leader said he would advise his associates to be "realistic" and not to expect "any early dramatic developments on the religious front."

But there would be a difference in the political climate with Barak's win, he said. "Now we won't have a flurry of bills being presented to the Knesset on the right way of converting to Judaism, or circumventing the Israeli Supreme Court, or on the composition of religious councils."

In the past few years the Reform movement had been at loggerheads with the government of Benjamin Netanyahu on the right of Reform and Conservative rabbis to formally oversee conversions in Israel. This is of particular importance to the Russian immigrants.

Rabbi Yoffie expressed enthusiasm about the development of Camp George, particularly about the enrolment of 280 campers for the first season, which he said was "far beyond our expectations".

On the question of some Reform rabbis (only one in Canada) agreeing to officiate at same sex marriages, Rabbi Yoffie said UAHC has not taken any official position on the issue, believing it is a decision for the Reform rabbinical body. That group has not yet taken an official stand on it, he noted.

There is a place for gays in Reform congregations, he said. "We're certainly not going to turn our backs on them." He added that officiating at gay marriage ceremonies is a separate issue.

Rabbi Yoffie, who identifies with the traditional wing of the Reform movement, said he welcomed the Canadian attachment to the traditional mode. "It adds pluralism, richness and diversity to our movement."

Munk gives Technion $7M gift for research centre

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Canadian entrepreneur Peter Munk and the companies he controls have given the Technion a $7 million gift.

The money will be used to build the Peter Munk Centre for Research, Innovation and Technology at the Haifa-based Technion, which is also known as the Israel Institute of Technology.

Munk and his wife, Melanie, gave $5 million, while Barrick Gold Corporation and TrizecHahn Corporation each donated $1 million.

At a gala dinner in Munk's honor at the Sheraton Centre Hotel, Arnold Recht, national president of the Canadian Technion Society, described the evening as "the single most successful fund-raising event ever held in Canada."

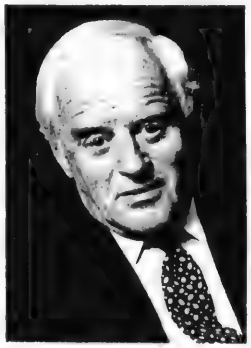
In a speech, Munk recalled his arrival in Canada as an immigrant, paid fulsome tribute to his adopted country, and spoke about his Jewish roots as well as Israel.

Munk and his family fled Nazi-occupied Hungary in 1944, making their way to neutral Switzerland via the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp in Germany.

In 1948, he came to Canada to attend the University of Toronto. He studied electrical engineering.

Today, Munk heads up a multi-billion dollar gold mining and real estate empire.

In his remarks, he remembered arriving in Halifax on a foggy, snowy day in March, boarding a train for the two-day journey to Toronto and being met at Union Station by his uncle and aunt, Nick and Hedy Munk.



Peter Munk

Canada offered freedom, openness and acceptance, while Europe represented racial exclusiveness, murder and hunger, he said.

Munk explained that he was determined to recreate his family's business success in Canada.

Speaking nostalgically of his Alma Mater, Munk said that the University of Toronto had helped facilitate his integration into Canadian society.

Paying homage to friends and colleagues, he paid special compliments to his wife who, he declared, has shared his life through thick and thin.

Jewishness, he acknowledged, did not come naturally to him.

His father was a Jew, while his mother was a Christian. As a result, he celebrated Jewish and Christian holidays.

Briefly recalling his boyhood in Budapest under the boot of the Nazis, Munk said that he had been proud to wear the mandatory yellow star.

Munk said that he appreciates the traditions and morality of Judaism, and is proud of being Jewish.

By his estimation, Israel is the epitome of Jewishness, represents "the end-game" of a 3,000-year odyssey, and signifies "the ultimate achievements and goals of a wandering Jewish nation."

In an allusion to the Technion, he suggested that Israel's survival is dependent on maintaining its technological superiority over the Arabs.

Art Eggleton, Canada's defence minister, called Munk a "remarkable person," while Brian Mulroney, the former Canadian prime minister, hailed him as a symbol of the splendid contributions immigrants have made to Canada.

Nina Munk, one of his children and a Fortune magazine staff writer, praised him for his "generosity of spirit," both as a father and a philanthropist.

Robert Prichard, president of the University of Toronto and host of the dinner, thanked Munk for having given the hospital affiliated with the university a cardiac unit.

Referring to his achievements as a businessman, he called him "the man with the Midas touch."

Recht said that the Technion, which marked its 51st anniversary last month, was instrumental in guiding Israel into the world of high technology and in powering its economic growth.

Technion scientists, he noted, were in the forefront of Israeli advances in agriculture, water policy and computer science, and in the development of medical diagnostic equipment.

Praising Munk's past philanthropy, Recht said that he had given the Technion funds for a garden in front of a student dormitory named in honor of his aunt and uncle. Hedy Munk attended the dinner.

Munk's life was summarized in a short video entitled Willingness to Dream.

Harris rules out public funding for Jewish schools

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ontario Premier Mike Harris has thrown cold water on the prospect that independent Jewish schools will receive government funding in any government he leads.

His comments during last week's leaders debate were much stronger and less ambiguous than the statement he made following discussions in February with representatives of Canadian Jewish Congress. At that time, he said aid to Jewish schools was not on his government's agenda.

The premier also told The CJN at the time that his first priority is the public system and that a second priority would be "to give equal opportunity to all children, and perhaps under this, we can give consideration to new funding."

Asked during the debate to comment on the privatization of the education system and the use of charter schools or vouchers, Harris said, "I've been asked if I would support private schools. I went to the [Canadian] Jewish Congress. I said, 'No, I'm sorry, my priority is public education.'"

Harris challenged Liberal leader Dalton McGuinty to match his commitment to the public system, arguing McGuinty had told Congress he favored aid to Jewish schools. McGuinty replied he told Congress "I'm not adverse to considering that."

Commenting on Harris' remarks, Keith Landy, chair of Congress' Ontario region, said: "We're uncomfortable with leaders of political parties in the heat of a political debate using throwaway lines to score points on an issue that's so important to our community. We're concerned the premier did not reaffirm his stated position to provide access to health support services to children in independent religious schools.

"While Harris declared the extension of public funding will not be forthcoming in the immediate future, we're confident the next provincial government will right a glaring injustice and deliver access to health support services for all children with special needs," he said.

Funding for independent Jewish schools "will continue to be the issue for Jewish parents... Of course, his statement is a disappointment to us," Landy added.

Spotlight

Wayne Levin, an organizer with Parents for Educational Choice (PEC), a grassroots lobby group, said the premier "was trying to twist things around to show McGuinty favored charter schools. That's how I read it."

Levin, who helped organize a public rally for school funding three weeks ago at Queen's Park, said PEC does not advocate charter schools or vouchers. "Our issue is that whatever is provided to any student should be provided to every student.

"It is discouraging. I'm not arguing that. The fact that the premier made it a Jewish issue and aimed the spotlight at us is disturbing," Levin said.

Arieh Waldman, a Jewish parent who is challenging Ontario's funding practices before the United Nations human rights committee, said that Harris "has clearly and publicly made the issue a Jewish issue when it's not just a Jewish issue. It's a discrimination issue for all people who want religious education for their children and who are not Catholic. It's a Muslim, Sikh, Protestant and Jewish issue.

"It's amazing in 1999 to hear comments like that," he said, adding it was improper for the premier to attempt to score debating points by focusing on Jews.

Harris' press secretary, Bob Reid, told the Toronto Star the premier never made a commitment to funding health programs in private schools.

"He said to the Congress he was prepared to have his ministers sit down with them and discuss ways that non-education programs currently provided through the public and separate systems might also be extended to private independent schools," Reid is quoted as saying.

McGuinty advisor Bob Lopinski said the Liberal party is committed to universal coverage for health services although funding for education is another matter.

Ehud Barak

The Israeli election drama is over. The drama of governing now begins. Prime Minister-elect Ehud Barak faces the formidable but so very vital task of having to build a solid, stable, secure governing structure from among the 15 splinters that more than 4.25 million voters shaved from the timber of Israel's diverse political parties.

The largest party grouping, Barak's own One Israel, garnered only 27 seats in the Knesset. The rival Likud party won 19 seats. Combined, the two largest "mainstream" parties won barely more than a third of the popular vote. Shas, surprisingly, won 17 seats. The remaining 57 seats were divided among12 other parties.

The party vote was, therefore, a distribution of increasingly narrower loyalties among 15 discrete political banners. The vote for the prime minister, on the other hand, was an impressive, unambiguous display of the people's clear-cut preference for the challenger over the incumbent.

It is this very strong demonstration of voter support, that gives Barak the moral, as well as the legal authority to lead the country along paths less travelled in recent years.

Those paths, Barak has promised, will be paths to peace: peace at home among brothers; peace abroad, with neighbors. But as all observers know, neither path leads inevitably to the hoped-for destination.

Many have travelled; fewer have arrived. In the Middle East especially, the roads are treacherous, strewn with the debris of previously failed efforts, with highwaymen lying in wait, hidden in dark corners.

Ehud Barak's agenda is full. He has won the election and it is no longer the agenda of a candidate, aspiring be the prime minister. It is now, rather, the agenda of an entire people.

We extend to him our congratulations on his victory and our best wishes for continued and renewed strength. May God bless his deliberations as prime minister with wisdom and courage and may God protect him and the people he represents as together they travel unexplored paths towards peace.

Benjamin Netanyahu

For Benjamin Netanyahu, both the election and the governing drama are over. Rejected by a majority of the voters in favor of his former commander, he has decided to step away from public life altogether, at least for the time being. A complex man, he engendered strong reactions from friend and foe alike.

In the end, he lost the support of a majority of the people because of those strong reactions, which, in certain circles, were relentless and unrestrained.

The legacy of his three-year term has yet to be written.

Elected in the horrible wake of the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, the people still traumatized by that unimaginable act, newly terrorized by the spate of murderous suicide bombings in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, and caught in the existential anxiety of a peace process moving more quickly than many could cope with, Netanyahu continued the process but slowed it down – many, of course, say he nearly derailed it – to a pace more manageable for most Israelis.

He also helped staunch Palestinian terrorism by publicly insisting upon reciprocal fulfilment of Oslo obligations from the Palestinian Authority. We pay tribute to Prime Minister Netanyahu's dedication and tenacity in the service of Israel.

Parents play crucial role in school shootings

Over the last few weeks, the disgusting acts of violence we have witnessed shocked all the adults of the world. But, I want to make it clear to all nations, cities and countries, that we, the youth of the world, have emotions, and feelings of desire to win or to lose, to laugh or to cry, to hurt.

There is no "cure" for what we have seen in the last few weeks. There is someone to blame. But it is not right to blame us, the ones who have not done anything, or us, the ones who have done something to broaden our horizons.

I, being young and part of the education process, have lived long enough to see that any one from your best friend to yourself can turn around and strike the innocent with or without realizing that they are doing it.

The answer to finding out what is wrong, lies in the need for social workers and teachers to see more than what is on the outside of any given student's actions. The outside may not always tell the truth. Then, there are the parents, the ones who can see on the inside. You, the parents, are the ones who have to find out; search within to find out the problem deep inside your child. (You can find the answer because they love you just as much as you love them, even if they do not show it). Then, the process of searching for the cure can start.

Being only 16, it has not taken me a certain degree of time to realize that the way I act or the way the people around me act, is from the environment that they have grown up in.

The sayings – excuse me or bless you – show some guidance in life. So please, to all you parents, guardians and teachers, show your children respect, and give them a little guidance. You will be surprised to see what you get in return. It may not be so bad after all.

On behalf of students of Canada and the youth of the world, my sincerest wishes of sympathy to all who have lost someone they loved, who have been hurt, or have just been touched by this tragedy.

Croatia can't be compared to Holocaust

Lately, it has become quite fashionable to compare the situation in the Balkans to the Holocaust. To me, a Holocaust survivor, this phenomenon is obviously quite irritating.

What really surprises me, was to see such a shocking comparison in a Jewish newspaper.

Your contributor to guest voices (April 22), Jill Cracower, made such an outrageous comparison in her article: "Shock, sadness in Croatia."

I don't doubt for a moment, Cracower's sincerity and devotion in helping the unfortunate. However, would she have paid more attention in her history classes, her choice of country in which to demonstrate her passion might have been different.

Now some advice to you Ms Cracower: Please don't ever compare any disaster, no matter how bad or cruel, to the Nazi Holocaust.

Cities and houses are easy to rebuild. Refugees, with some unfortunate exceptions, eventually return to their homes and are reunited with their families.

But the six million Jewish men, women and children who perished in a network of Nazi concentration camps and in the gas chambers of Auschwitz, Majdanek and Treblinka, will never return.

Balkan crisis demands UN act on self-determination

In "Rethinking support of NATO air strikes" (CJN, Apr. 22), Henry Srebrnik raises a number of interesting points. I believe that the crucial statement, "Every people has the right to self-determination..." (derived from the 1966 UN Covenant on Civil and Political Rights), can only be a recipe for disaster if the term "people" is not clearly defined.

The problems created by present day nationalisms can be traced to two events: the Fourteen Points of Wilson, where the term "self-determination" entered the political lexicon, and the United Nations Charter, which banned any territorial conquest by force.

After 1946, any remaining "people" still with no land of their own, were caught in an impasse. The Jewish people is a case in point. Their tortuous path to recover their nationhood after 2000 years of "non-nation" status is an eloquent example of the difficulties created by those two seminal events in 20th-century politics.

The idea of self-determination, though it certainly has a positive impact in the post-colonial era, should be given a new breath of life, lest a multitude of grouplets of every conceivable size and background start igniting bloody conflagrations throughout the world. We must recognize that very few countries can boast being as truly democratic and peacefully multicultural, as Canada is. Western Europe is not spared from brewing nationalisms, even if sometimes the particularities of the "people" in question are difficult to identify ("Padania" in northern Italy). Therefore, an international commission, possibly under the auspices of the United Nations, should take the lead in formulating the criteria under which a "people" is entitled to become a sovereign nation within a defined territory.

Barak followed mentor Rabin

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Ehud Barak swept to a lightning victory in Israel's elections last week, as befits a man whose Hebrew name means just that.

Barak's stunning victory over Likud's Benjamin Netanyahu is just the final step in the former army chief of staff's near-meteoric rise from career military man to the top of Israel's political ladder.

It is also another way in which Barak's trajectory has followed that of his mentor, the slain Yitzhak Rabin.

Like Rabin, Barak, 57, came to politics following an illustrious military career. And like his mentor, he appears to have similarly meshed an image of soldier-peacemaker.

Barak, along with Maj.-Gen. Yitzhak Mordechai, surveys an apartment destroyed by a Katyusha rocket in 1992.

Barak was born in 1942 near Netanya, at Kibbutz Mishmar Hasharon – which his mother, Esther Brog, an immigrant from Poland, helped found.

An accomplished pianist, he earned a bachelor's degree in physics and mathematics from the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, and a master's degree in economic-engineering systems from Stanford University.

He is married and has three children.

Israel's most-decorated soldier, Barak's military career spanned more than 30 years. He held key command positions in the Israel Defence Force during the 1967 Six Day War and the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

As head of the IDF's most elite unit, he commanded Netanyahu in one of its most well-known missions, leading an assault on a hijacked Belgian airliner at Ben-Gurion Airport in 1972, killing the hijackers and rescuing scores of passengers. A year later, he posed as a woman, in a raid in Beirut in which three Palestinian fighters were killed.

Barak, who left the army as chief of staff in 1995, served briefly as interior minister in Rabin's Labor-led government. Following Rabin's assassination in 1995, Barak served as foreign minister in the government led by Shimon Peres. He succeeded Peres as party leader in 1997.

On election night

Visiting the Western Wall

As IDF chief of staff in the 1990s, he was involved in Israel's emerging peace negotiations with its Arab neighbors. He helped finalize Israel's 1994 peace treaty with Jordan, and met with his Syrian counterpart in negotiations with Damascus. He also oversaw Israel's redeployment in parts of the West Bank and Gaza Strip under the Oslo accords.

Throughout his campaign, Barak pledged to reinvigorate the Middle East peace process spearheaded by Rabin and brought to a near standstill under the three-year government of Benjamin Netanyahu.

In his victory speech, Barak reiterated his commitment to achieving peace with the Palestinians – calling for a separation of the two peoples, and reiterating that Jerusalem will remain the undivided capital of Israel.

Regarding Syria, Barak has said he is open to territorial compromise on the Golan Heights, but would not return to the pre-1967 borders. Barak pledged during the campaign to pull Israeli troops out of Lebanon within a year of being elected. He has already seen a taste of what lies ahead on this track, when Katyusha rockets landed in northern Israel overnight last week.

Addressing jubilant supporters before dawn at the Tel Aviv square where Rabin was shot by Yigal Amir, Barak promised to continue in Rabin's path.

Later that day he visited Rabin's grave at Jerusalem's Mount Herzl after stopping at the Western Wall in Jerusalem.

But his first task is to bridge the deep social and ethnic divides in Israeli society, which were so starkly evident in the bitter five-month campaign that preceded his election.

In the campaign against Netanyahu, Barak assembled a Labor-led list incorporating representatives from Gesher, the predominantly Sephardi movement that champions the rights of blue-collar Israelis, and Meimad, the moderate Orthodox movement.

"I intend to be the prime minister of all. Whatever differences there are between us, we are brothers, and brothers stay together," he declared in his victory speech after the election.

In the next few weeks Barak must cobble together a governing coalition from the 15 parties that will have seats in Israel's next Knesset.

The controversy over 'Life is Beautiful'

By this time, most readers of this column will be aware that the recent award to the Italian film Life is Beautiful, and the singling out of the chief actor, Roberto Benigni, as the best actor in the business, has aroused a great deal of controversy. The critics say, in effect, that the term "life is beautiful" is offensive to the memory of the Holocaust, and that the awards to the film and to Benigni in a glitzy ceremony, added to the insult. There is nothing remotely beautiful about the Shoah and its memory, say the critics, and it should not be abducted into a Hollywood spectacular.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Elie Wiesel once said that silence is the only true response to the terrible realities of the Shoah. Though for many years he did write about it, he has of late returned to his first opinion and no longer lectures on the subject.

Yet, it is the film industry, that through such pictures as Shoah, Schindler's List and The Last Days, has kept the gentile world aware of the Holocaust; the fact that they have attracted much attention, as has Life is Beautiful, is to be welcomed rather than targeted as the object of criticism.

The fact is, that describing the Holocaust is in and of itself an impossibility. One cannot do it right – and though one says much about it, it can never be enough, Nor can it ever be accurate and recall the extent of the tragedy. Saying "six million dead" are a mere three words that imply the inexpressibility of what they try to describe.

The best defence that I have yet read of Life is Beautiful comes from Dennis Prager, who devotes a page to it in his publication, The Prager Perspective. Here are a few brief excerpts from his arguments: "First, the depiction of the father's love for his son is the most powerful of such depiction I have ever watched. As a father of two sons, I so completely identified with Guido (Roberto Benigni) that at one point in the film, I walked out, so deep was the pain caused by my tension over the fate of the boy and his father.

"Second, every fibre in my body resonates with the film's idea that a good parent does everything in his power to protect his children from pain and from losing their innocence. If the criterion is an accurate depiction of true horror, what Holocaust film came close? Perhaps no Holocaust film has ever forced people to relate as intimately to Jewish victims as did Life is Beautiful. That is why the first half of the film, during which we come to love the family that ends up in camp, is so crucial. That is why this was the only Holocaust film that I had to leave for a few minutes because the tension was so great. I had to know and love the victims. And by the way, 'light' films do not end with the father murdered."

It is a sad fact, that historical revisionists who deny the existence of the Holocaust altogether will force us to retell the story time and again. Historians alone cannot do it because they are read by relatively few – the media will continue to have a role, and I for one, happen to agree with Dennis Prager over his assessment of Life is Beautiful.

Life lessons learned

It took nine pieces of checked luggage and four carry-ons to get all my belongings back to Thornhill from my tiny Halifax home. I'm sure the laws of physics were stretched when I think about how much stuff I was able to fit into a not-quite eight feet by eight feet room all year long.

Jennifer Fox in Thornhill

A month later, I can't say I miss my former living quarters, though I can say that I miss the experience of being on my own, and the city which I call mine for eight months of the year.

Way back in September, I wrote of my fears of starving because I didn't know the difference between an oven mitt and a muffin tray. I did manage – hats off to whoever invented peanut butter – but not without learning a few things here and there. For example, oven mitts are those things that prevent you from burning your fingers. Unfortunately, I learned this important lesson a tad too late.

Of all the life lessons I received this past year, the most important is what I learned about Haligonians and their city. From a student's point of view, Halifax is a nice place to live.

Walking distance isn't a concept that's applicable to life in the suburbs. Walk 15 minutes, and you might just make it out of your subdivision. Another 20 minutes, and you'll arrive at the bus stop that takes you to the subway where you'll finally get to where you're going.

Not the case in my East Coast home. In 15 minutes you're on campus, and in another 15 minutes you've made it downtown. More often than not, you'll spot a fellow classmate on your journey. The only unfortunate part, is that your nice, leisurely walk down to the water is uphill on the way back.

What I truly admire about Halifax, is the way Haligonians and other Atlantic Canadians possess hometown pride. Over the past two school years, I have defended Toronto in the occasional debate between Maritimer and Upper Canadians (as we're called), but it is usually because I feel the need to play devil's advocate.

I don't feel as attached to the land as they do. My friends explain that they could never live far from the ocean. Unless they can hear it lapping on the shore, it's too far. I wish for that kind of connection with a city.

If I left Thornhill permanently, I wouldn't be too shook up about it. My only criteria for happiness are having four distinct seasons and a decent used bookstore.

During my time at King's, I was often heard to whine about the Jewish (or lack thereof) community in Halifax. I apologize for my whining because it's simply not true.

Though Halifax, or the entire East Coast provinces, may never have synagogues that equal the number found in Toronto, or have grocery stores carrying large selections of Passover food, you can be a fully functioning and happy Jew in the city.

There are families who open their homes to strangers for the holidays, and organizations giving kids, students and adults the opportunity to meet and do things with other Jews. And in my experience, there are those people who are not Jewish, but are accepting and interested in that which is different from them.

Now, I'm back in Thornhill. It's back to cars and subways instead of feet and buses. My belongings are all unpacked, and have found a place in a room larger than a closet. But I know that in four months time, I will bundle everything back into the nine suitcases, hop on a plane and return home.

May a time of change

I lay in bed the other morning trying to figure out what I should write about. My brain had been in vacation mode for three weeks, and on vacation, I tend not to like to think too hard about anything.

Erica Horn in Montreal

I scanned my brain for current events in the news – both the shootings at Columbine High School and the attack on Yugoslavia had already been editorialized to the point of supersaturation.

The new Star Wars release is receiving enough media attention, and I was never really much of a fan. Darth Vader's voice sends shivers down my spine and I never really understood what was going on with R2D2. This robot rolls around talking gibberish, which only a select few can understand.

Then there is Princess Leah (I doubt any relation to Jacob's daughter) whose braids on the side of her head are always perfect, with not even a single hair out of place. The characters fly on some sort of ship, trying to avoid their enemies.

Also, I always used to confuse Star Wars and Star Trek. So, I came to the realization that a piece on the new Star Wars movie would, at best, be an inaccurate representation of something I could barely make sense of myself.

I decided, therefore, to think of events closer to home. The Yom Hashoah and Yom Hazikaron commemorations and Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations had already passed and school is now over.

And then, suddenly, as though the suggestion had been staring me in the face all along, I knew what I could write about: the month of May – May mania, May madness, and May mayhem. The month of May has always been a month of transitions, of shifting gears and of change.

This year, my last exam was on April 30 and thus, May 1 represented my first day of vacation. On May 1, I packed my notebooks and textbooks in brown boxes and put them at the back of my cupboard. I threw away inkless pens and printer cartridges, transforming my room from Hurricane Exams to Vacation City. I was free at last.

This year, May brought with it warmer weather than usual. It was time to put away the spring jackets and long pants and try on shorts and T-shirts. And, then, in the second week of May, it was time again to take out the spring jackets and long pants. So, as I said, May is the month for shifting gears (I just never specified exactly how many times).

Our five-month-old chocolate lab, Truman, has started to shed his coat. Our house which used to be absolutely spotless, is now being covered in his hairs.

Last week, I got my wisdom teeth pulled (not one of the more pleasant experiences I have endured) and thus, my mouth has shifted from being full with 32 teeth to being swollen and stitched up with only 28.

This May, most of my friends are taking MCAT and LSAT courses to prepare for the tests, which will hopefully secure them a spot in the medical or law school of their choice. May, therefore, has come to symbolize a point in time when my friends are able to focus on what they want to do with their lives, while I am still left pondering.

I am aware that these changes are personal and therefore are unlikely to affect most of you. However, it is important to be aware of changes occurring in your own lives and to look forward to them.

During the school year, the only constant I am guaranteed is being inundated with work. Towards the end of April, I found myself anxiously awaiting the beginning of May.

When it finally arrived, I was so overwhelmed, I didn't know what to do first (although my mother had my first week planned – she insisted I clean my room and then she arranged for me to have my wisdom teeth pulled).

The key to happiness is having something to look forward to. In the coming weeks, I have planned a trip to Plattsburgh and to La Ronde. I will also spend time with my friends, get in shape (I always say that!) and relax before leaving for camp. I may even go see the new Star Wars movie to finally try to understand it.

Happy May!

Character counted in Israeli elections

Character counts, as Benjamin Netanyahu belatedly discovered on May 17, when Israeli voters turfed him out as Israel's first directly elected prime minister and replaced him with his Labor party rival, Ehud Barak.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The election campaign ultimately focused on Netanyahu rather than on the plethora of issues facing Israel – the frozen peace process with the Palestinians and Syria, the faltering economy, the ethnic and religious fissures convulsing Israeli society, and the continuing mini-war in southern Lebanon.

At the end of the day, Netanyahu, the most divisive Israeli prime minister since 1949, was indubitably the overriding issue, at least as far as 56 percent of Israelis were concerned.

In essence, the election turned into a referendum of Netanyahu's personality and style of governance, and the people found him wanting.

Netanyahu, Israel's youngest prime minister, alienated core supporters, and confirmed the worst suspicions of his adversaries. By all accounts, he was arrogant, cynical, insincere, secretive, untrustworthy and lacking that most basic of qualities – integrity.

In the aftermath of the 1996 election, which he won by the skin of his teeth, Netanyahu was presented with the opportunity of healing the self-inflicted wounds of a divided nation traumatized by the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin. But Netanyahu failed the test abysmally. He stoked the fires of divisiveness, playing on old resentments and fears. He was a politician, not a statesman.

Former Likud colleagues and cabinet ministers, ranging from Dan Meridor and Benny Begin to David Levy and Yitzhak Mordechai, grew disillusioned, and abandoned him in disgust. Even his mentor, Moshe Arens, challenged his leadership. Virtually all of them concurred that he was temperamentally unfit to be prime minister.

The antipathy he aroused crystallized on the eve of the election. Mordechai, the Centre party leader who had served as his defence minister, endorsed Barak. Begin, the far-right candidate who resigned as Netanyahu's science minister, pointedly refused to endorse him. And Natan Sharansky, the trade minister whom Netanyahu had assiduously worked to free from a Soviet gulag, remained studiously and devastatingly neutral.

These were not the sole factors contributing to Netanyahu's demise after less than three years in office. He ran an increasingly desperate campaign, masterminded by American adviser Arthur Finkelstein, which accentuated the negative. There was an inevitable backlash.

Netanyahu, a consummate insider who masqueraded as an outsider, spoke darkly of the "elites" ruling Israel. He disengenuously identified himself with the Sepharadi "riff-raff." The master of the soundbite, Netanyahu mercilessly attacked the media, which had nurtured him at the outset of his career.

Harking back to a 1996 campaign theme which eventually destroyed Shimon Peres' candidacy, he claimed, falsely, that Barak was a "leftist" who would "divide" Jerusalem. And in a series of lurid, counter-productive advertisements of buses being blown up by suicide bombers, Netanyahu strongly suggested that terrorism would return with the election of the Labor party (In fact, there were three suicide bombings during his watch, claiming the lives of 24 persons).

Netanyahu signally failed to convince voters that "the left" would countenance a Palestinian state which "would endanger our very existence." He took credit for forcing Yasser Arafat to defer a proclamation of Palestinian statehood on May 4, but few voters were swayed by the claim. And he lost further credibility by attempting to foment an artificial crisis over Orient House, the PLO's headquarters in eastern Jerusalem, and by ordering ground to be broken at Har Choma, the planned housing estate in Jerusalem, on the day before the election.

Benjamin Netanyahu

And in a final burst of electioneering which rang hollow, he claimed that Barak had reached an agreement with "anti-Zionist forces" (namely the Israeli Arab candidate Azmi Bishara) to withdraw from the prime ministerial race. In fact, there was no such understanding.

Beyond all that, there are a number of other reasons for Netanyahu's downfall, exactly 22 years to the day that the Likud triumphed in its first election. Barak, the former chief of staff, was widely perceived as a strong, security-minded candidate in the mould of Rabin. Barak's centrist One Israel coalition, which co-opted Levy's Gesher party and the Meimad movement, siphoned away crucial Sephardi and moderate Orthodox votes from Netanyahu. Moreover, Barak improved his standing in the Russian community, and thanks to Bishara's and Mordechai's withdrawals, gained a pivotal advantage over Netanyahu.

Most important of all, perhaps, the campaign was not marred by suicide bombings, which had doomed Peres' chances of reelection.

Netanyahu's tenure as prime minister was characterized by a roller-coaster of crises and one scandal – the Bar-On affair – which gave him the dubious distinction of being the first premier against whom the police recommended criminal charges.

Without consulting his security officials, he authorized the opening of an archeological tunnel exit in Jerusalem which touched off the most serious Palestinian rioting in the territories since the Six Day War.

Under Netanyahu, Israel's relationship with the Palestinians – and the Arab world in general – deteriorated sharply. He expanded existing Israeli settlements in the West Bank, permitted supporters to build unauthorized new ones, and failed to renew talks with Syria. Netanyahu treated Arafat as an adversary and not as a partner in peacemaking, and often they were not even on speaking terms.

Netanyahu initially condemned and then grudgingly accepted the Oslo peace process. To his everlasting credit, he jettisoned the Likud's rejection of territorial compromise in the West Bank, persuaded many Likudniks to embrace the reality and logic of Oslo, and moved the party toward the centre of the political spectrum.

But for every step forward, Netanyahu took one or two steps backwards. After months of bitter negotiations, he finally agreed to sign the 1997 Hebron redeployment accord. But then, in a unilateral maneuver designed to appease his extreme right-wing constituents, he announced plans to build Har Choma, a development which prompted the Palestinians to more or less boycott the peace talks for about 18 months. The impasse was broken when Israel, under the 1998 Wye memorandum, agreed to make a further 13 percent phased withdrawal from the West Bank in exchange for Palestinian promises to crack down on terrorism.

Netanyahu carried out the first of three withdrawals, but in the face of fierce resistance from some cabinet ministers, he turned against Wye on the grounds that the Palestinians were not fulfilling their reciprocal obligations. He thereby antagonized his prime supporters, lost the Labor party's "safety net," and was forced to dissolve his government and call new elections.

Netanyahu promised to bring Israel "peace with security." But when he resigned as Likud party leader last week, Israel had neither peace nor security.

Defining leadership

By AVI BENLOLO

The question of what makes a good Jewish leader has perplexed me for some time. Defining leadership itself is nearly impossible and often leads to controversy rather than consensus.

There have been many pre-eminent Jewish leaders such as Moses, King David, Theodor Herzl and David Ben-Gurion, to name just a few.

In my view, Don Yosef Nasi was amongst the great Jewish leaders of the world. As a leader, Nasi represented the most important tenets of Judaism, including charity to Jewish institutions and to the needy, love of HaShem and the Torah, devotion and commitment to his people and personal sacrifice.

Nasi was a Marrano who, as a child, fled Spain and then Portugal with his family during the Inquisition in the 15th and 16th centuries.

Forced to adopt Christianity, the Nasi family continued to practise Judaism in secrecy, despite the fact that Nasi's parents were burned to death at the hands of the inquisitors.

The Nasi family was prominent and influential. They owned banks and properties throughout Europe. However, they were not spared the trials and tribulations of the Inquisition.

From Portugal, the family escaped to Antwerp. They went on to Venice and Ferrara, finally settling in Turkey. Once in Turkey, Yosef Nasi was circumcised so that he could become a full-fledged Jew.

Wherever the Nasis settled, they saw their task as coming to the aid of their fellow Marranos – forming numerous institutions like a Free Loan Fund and a Bridal Dowry Fund in Antwerp.

One of the numerous scholarly pieces they subsidized was the Spanish translation of the Bible, which inevitably helped many Marranos who could not read Hebrew return to their faith.

Nasi's leadership of the Jewish people peaked in Turkey as he became deeply involved in the affairs of Jewish life. He planned and financially supported escape routes throughout Europe for fellow Marranos. Moreover, he inspired a financial boycott of the Italian port city of Ancona after Pope Paul IV arrested and imprisoned all of the city's ex-Marranos as apostatizing Christians.

He viewed the fate of the Jewish people as his concern. For example, using his close relationship with Turkey's Sultan Suleiman the Magnificent, Nasi convinced him to grant the Jews settlement in Tiberias. He quickly invited the persecuted Jews of Europe to settle there, even offering his ships to transport them there, free of charge.

Nasi's dream was clearly to rebuild the nation of Israel in the Holy Land. His intention was to rescue Jews from the clutches of the Inquisition to enable them to freely practise their religion. Nasi even convinced the sultan to go to war with Venice in order to capture Cyprus as a future kingdom for the Jews.

In the eyes of his Jewish brethren and Muslim friends, Nasi became Yosef HaNasi – Yosef the prince. He was no longer a private person, but a public servant. He understood that in leadership, it was not enough to be responsible for one's own family, but that he also had to look out for the entire nation.

An assortment of riches

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today an assortment of sites where you could find out how to win a lot of money, get some free advice about life's problems, debate about the world's best deli and maybe even find out how to save your life.

A few generations ago, if you needed help with a problem all you had to do was ask Yenta. Nowadays, just Ask Yenta [http://www.AskYenta.com]. This is a lively new discussion area where you can get some homespun advice from the virtual Yenta and other surfers. You can pose a question (Should all Jews live in Israel?) or if you want, share a favorite recipe or joke. ("If a pig loses its voice, is it disgruntled?") This is a new site which could benefit from more traffic and Yentas.

Dr. Suzanne Schwartz has done a real service with her Jewish Observance and Burn Prevention Web site [http://www.bethsholom.org/burnsafe.htm]. It never occurred to me how many Jewish traditions revolve around fire and how dangerous a Jewish home can be to a young child. There are so many ceremonies in the home that call for candles, like Shabbat, holidays, Chanukah and havdalah. And there are constant electrical risks posed by sukkah space heaters, hot water urns and stove elements left on for days. Schwartz points out that the incidence of burns among children of observant families is inordinately high. Then she details how families can prevent those tragedies.

Sara Davidovits has asked me to mention The International Coalition for Missing Israel Soldiers [http://www.mia.org.il]. Ron Arad is the best known missing Israeli soldier. Unfortunately he is not alone. This site also tells the stories of Zvi Feldman, Zachary Baumel and Yehuda Katz.

According to the site, in June 1982, Yehuda, Zachary and Zvi were captured at the battle of Sultan Yakoub, Lebanon. They remain captives, held incommunicado for over 15 years. The coalition works for their release.

Here's a site to sink your teeth into. The Deli Project is a repository for jokes, recipes and memories about that quintessential Jewish institution, the delicatessen [http://www.deliproject.com]. According to the authors, the deli is more than just a restaurant. It's a piece of modern Jewish archeology. "The delis of yesterday contain more than pastrami and blintzes – they hold the values, the pleasures, the connections of our community. Jews and non-Jews alike come to the deli to feed a hunger that goes beyond the stomach. That hunger is for the sense of identity, the feeling of being 'home' with our people – this is the other hunger that the deli satisfies."

Do you spend much too much time surfing the Web? At least make your hours profitable. At Treasurusalem, you are challenged to be the first to decipher their online jigsaw puzzle and win a $5,000 prize [http://www.snunit.k12.il/treasurusalem/]. Problems are solved by deciphering of a series of devilishly hard riddles. Good luck!

Have you created a Web page that you are proud of? Or is there a Jewish page that you find your yourself constantly revisiting that you feel everyone should know about? Please e-mail me about them at the address below.

This weekend the eyes and ears of Europe will be trained on Jerusalem. Fortunately, the focus this time is music, as Israel hosts the Eurovision song contest. Israel has won the Eurovision three times. In 1978, Yizhar Cohen won with the song A-ba ni-bi and the next year, Israel won again, with Gali Atari & Milk and Honey singing the now famous Halleluyah. Last year, Dana International won with the song Diva. As winner of the contest, Israel will be staging this year's competition.

You can listen to the Yom Huledet (Birthday) by the group Eden [http://eurovision-pr.walla.co.il/], compare it to the 22 other entries [http://israeliculture.miningco.com/library/weekly/aa042799.htm] and choose your own winner.

Roots & Remembrance

The family custodian

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

"A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches." – Prov. 22:1.

David Birnbaum pulls a book off a shelf, opens to the frontispiece, and unfolds a genealogical chart. The book is Et Laasot, and contains collected works of his renowned grandfather, Nathan Birnbaum, and a large and beautifully drawn family tree.

The chart goes back 34 generations to Rashi, the medieval biblical and talmudic commentator. It is filled with the names of many illustrious rabbis: Luria, Shapira, the Maharal of Padua, the Maharam of Eisenstadt, Moshe Isserlis, Schach of Moravia....

A retired urban planner and architect, David is the son of Solomon Birnbaum, a Yiddish scholar and expert in Hebrew paleography who also wrote numerous books, including one on the Dead Sea Scrolls. David's grandfather, Nathan Birnbaum, was a writer and proponent of early Zionist ideology, who co-founded Kadima, a Jewish student organization, in 1882.

"He invented the word 'Zionism,'" David says of his grandfather. "He always thought of it more in a cultural sense, not just a territorial sense. As time went on, he got interested in Yiddish as an expression of Jewish culture."

David has become the custodian of an astonishing collection of books, manuscripts, articles, photographs and other artifacts of his distinguished family legacy. A room on the main floor of his modest home in North York is stuffed with a seemingly impossible amount of archival material. But most of the collection is downstairs, in a large room cramped with rows of shelves and filing cabinets which give it the distinct appearance of an institutional library.

"My father organized everything. I'm just trying to keep the ship afloat. It's very hard. I'm trying to get everything catalogued. I've been looking for some good software, in Hebrew and English..."

The filing cabinets contain tens of thousands of letters to his grandfather, some with famous signatures – Herzl, Hildesheimer, Adler, Jacobovits, Nordau, Sassoon, Roth, even Glicenstein. "A library in Israel [the National Jewish Library] wanted all my grandfather's letters, particularly those on early Zionism. They photocopied them, and helped us organize and preserve them."

David pulls a book from a shelf: Yiddish, A Survey and A Grammar, written by Nathan Birnbaum and published in Toronto in 1979, when the author was 88. He shows me another of his father's works, The Sayings of the Baal Shem Tov, based on original Yiddish sources. He gestures towards a shelf of more than 100 books written by his grandfather. The shelf also contains numerous books about him.

"These box files here are about my father — all sorts of people discussing him, attacking him, defending him. My father never had enough money, but he kept things going."

David, too, tries to keep things going, answering the many inquiries that reach him from all over the world. "I spend a lot of time answering them. My brother helps me when he has time."

The Birnbaum family has established an official charity, the Nathan and Solomon Birnbaum Archives Foundation. "All of this material is eventually going to go into an institution," says David. "Right now, I don't know where."

Every successful family historian eventually has to contend with the problem of where to place one's collection for posterity.

The role of angels

By RABBI BERNARD BASKIN

Books
Bernard Baskin

The well-advertised exhibition at the Art Gallery of Ontario, Angels from the Vatican, has rekindled interest in a complex and many-sided subject. Are we back to the angelic fervor of a few years ago? Do we face a new torrent of books, cards, calendars, gift items and assorted paraphernalia about these strange and disturbing creatures?

As supernatural celestial beings, angels play a significant role in Jewish thought and literature from earliest biblical times. The Hebrew word mal'ach signifies a messenger or agent; it is as God's messenger that the mal'ach becomes an angel. There is a vast trove of aggadic lore, legend and speculation about angels.

In Genesis, angels assume the form of three human messengers. They tell Abraham and Sarah, in their old age, that they will soon have their first child. An angel stops Abraham from sacrificing Isaac on Mount Moriah and orders him to offer up the ram instead. Jacob wrestles with an angel. Moses, at the Burning Bush, receives the Divine Message through an angel. God promises the Jews who leave Egypt that angels will precede them in order to bring them safely to the Holy Land. There are numerous other examples.

Individual Israelites, in the mystical tradition, have guardian angels. A Jew is given one angel with the fulfilment of each commandment, and two accompany him constantly. On Sabbath eve, a good and evil angel accompany each worshipper as he returns from the synagogue. In the sanctuary on high, the mal'achei ha-sharet (ministering angels) perform the priestly functions.

Some Jewish teachers believed that each Jew is represented by an angelic advocate in heaven. The Jewish patron angel is Michael, who outranks even Gabriel. Whenever the Jewish people are accused of wrongdoing, Michael steps forward before the heavenly court to defend them.

The most terrible of the destroying angels is the mal'ach ha-mavet (the angel of death), who waits at the bedside of the sick. At the tip of his sword hangs a lethal drop of venom. Originally the angel of death, like other angels, personified a function of the divine will, but gradually he acquired a definitely demonic individuality. He is linked and at times identified with "satan" (who tempts and accuses) the evil inclination, and "Samael," the prince of demons.

Many sages thought that angels restrained individuals from doing evil. One such teacher was Eleazar ben Judah of Worms, who lived about 700 years ago. In his Book of the Angels, he asserted that God created angels to assure proper human behavior.

The Kabbalah asserts that Jews can appeal to angels through incantations, amulets and magic words. On amulets, Jews can write the names of angels and add a prayer to them for deliverance and relief. On one of these ancient amulets we find a convolutely worded prayer for the cure for stupidity.

"Take a piece of parchment made of kosher deer and suspend it on your right arm. Fast that day, and write the following on it: 'I perform a cure from heaven. May this stupid heart be opened up, and the names of…Michael and Gabriel, Ashriel and Shamshiel, and Zuriel and Azariel and Samhiel and Kabniel and Hodiel and Barachiel and Peniel and Anabiel, and Tarpiel, so that the stupid heart shall be opened which is harder than that of an ox, and he shall study and not forget. Amen, Selah, Hallelujah."

All the major Jewish philosophers – except Philo – adopted a nationalist view of angels. Maimonides insisted that an angel is nothing extraordinary or supernatural – a mere messenger. Therefore, every human being with a worthy message is, in a sense, an angel.

Generally speaking, contemporary Judaism regards allusions to angels in scripture and the liturgy as poetic and symbolic, rather than of doctrinal import or moral significance.

A popular and authentic guide to the entire matter of angels in Jewish tradition and literature is A Gathering of Angels (1994) by Rabbi Morris B. Margolies.

Conservative, Reform stress diversity

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO – The desire for uniformity in Judaism will inevitably divide the religion, says the international president of the Rabbinical Assembly.

"To have a flourishing, harmonious community, we must make allowance for differences," Rabbi Seymour Essrog, a Conservative rabbi, said at a recent public forum sponsored by the Toronto Board of Rabbis. Also speaking at the forum, held recently at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am, was Rabbi Richard Levy, international president of the Central Conference of American Rabbis.

Judaism should not be one individual mass, Essrog said, but rather, 12 tribes and 12 different roofs. "Recognizing our distinctions gives us a sense of oneness and unity, and unity for the Jewish people is more important than similarity.

"God has recognized these differences, and His creatures should be equal to the task."

Rabbi Levy, a Reform rabbi, said that being open to all Jews is a "two-edged sword. We not only need to respect other Jews, we want them to respect us. I want klal Israel to include concern for the equality of women and concern for gays."

The Reform movement's new statement of principles, which should soon be passed, said Rabbi Levy, will give people a positive definition of Reform Judaism. "The statement will reaffirm the individual notion of mitzvot. We have always stressed the role of the individual in mitzvot.

"We hope, that as we help Reform Jews see them as options, that more and more people will see the call of the mitzvot.

"Appropriate dialogue will remove the idea that some mitzvot are banned to Reform Jews.

"This will make it easier for Reform synagogues to place tallit in full view of congregants without feeling that they are imposing on people."

The new statement of principles should "commit the Reform movement to take into account the views and sensitivities of Jews around the world."

The movements within Judaism are very important, said Rabbi Levy. "To eliminate them would lessen diversity, and lessen the particular impacts of Judaism from the various streams.

"We should value the fact that we find value in the different types of davening our movements have developed."

A reconfiguration of Judaism, he said, would mean the loss of experience for many people. "This is most important for Reform Jews. We should help them be open to all of Torah, not necessarily accepting it, but being open to dialogue.

"My view of pluralism is that all of us receive the Torah; all of us receive it differently; and we can all learn from each other."

Israel Funwalk '99 set

TORONTO — The Jewish community's largest annual event combines healthy activity, a visual sampling of historic Jewish Toronto and support for a good cause.

On May 30, thousands of walkers will meander through the streets of downtown Toronto – including former Jewish neighborhoods – in the UJA Federation Israel Funwalk '99.

The festivities will begin at Nathan Phillips Square with registration commencing at 9:15 a.m. The walk itself will kick off at 10:30 and end at Ontario Place, site of the Israel Funwalk Festival. In between, walkers will enjoy entertainment, food, prizes, celebrities and music.

Steven Page of the Barenaked Ladies, Liberty Silver and the Stars Band will perform at Nathan Phillips Square while the Simpletones, klezmer and Jewish music are on tap for Ontario Place.

"We've added three new features to the walk this year," said Fran Grundman, one of three Walk co-chairs. "At Nathan Phillips Square, we're creating a carnival atmosphere to add more excitement to the start of the walk. There's a new checkpoint, with added entertainment and cartoon characters. And the gigantic kosher barbecue at Ontario Place is a welcome addition for the many hungry walkers."

An array of prizes will be distributed, including a free flight to Israel, compliments of El Al Israel Airlines, Leafs and Raptors tickets, sports equipment, T-shirts, a Nintendo Gameboy and movie passes.

Incentives for walkers include a free pass at Ontario Place for every $25 in sponsorships.

UJA Federation expects the funwalk will attract 10,000 participants. Last year, 20,000 walkers turned out to celebrate Israel's 50th birthday. They raised $250,000 for the UJA's annual campaign. Proceeds raised at this year's Funwalk are slated for the UJA's 2000 campaign.

Information kits are available at UJA Federation offices at 4600 Bathurst St., at the Bathurst Jewish Centre, 4588 Bathurst St., or the Bloor Jewish Community Centre, 750 Spadina Ave.

For more information or to volunteer, call 631-7500 or check out the Walk Web site at www. feduja. org/funwalk99.

NDP battles incumbents in Don Valley East

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Liberal MPP David Caplan, Education Minister Dave Johnson and NDP hopeful Janaki Bala-Krishnan are squaring off in Don Valley East, the riding incorporating the old wards of Oriole, York Mills and Don Mills.

Janaki Bala-Krishnan

David Caplan

David Johnson

There are about 70,000 voters in the riding, with many Chinese, Iranian, Armenian and Italian residents. About 30 percent of the population are seniors, and half are homeowners.

Education is the Liberals' priority in this election, says Caplan, a former North York Board of Education trustee who, since 1997, has represented Oriole, the riding his mother Elinor, now an MP, held for years.

"There has been considerable damage done to the publicly funded education system," Caplan told The CJN, "and we have to bring back confidence and stability."

One of his party's priorities is to make junior kindergarten mandatory and fully funded.

"As it stands now, the school board is given money, and it can be used for something else, rather than for JK. We also plan on fully funding adult education, and providing funds for special education."

By slashing funding, he says, the Conservatives have pitted one group of students against another.

Seniors and youth, says Caplan have become the most vulnerable group of tenants.

"Seniors, by and large, live on fixed incomes, and some have to make a choice between rent and food. Without rent control, seniors are virtual prisoners of where they live. They can't move to be closer to family or certain amenities because their rents would go up tremendously in their new apartment."

The problem, he says, is rooted in the province's downloading of social housing on the municipalities. "It is costing $2 billion just to keep up the social housing that is now available, and there is now an eight- or nine-year waiting list."

Seniors are also suffering from lack of proper care, Caplan says, due to budget cuts to hospitals.

"The theory was that people would be taken care of by various organizations, but these organizations have also had their budgets cut. More and more seniors are being forced to stay at home without proper care. Their health is deteriorating."

Caplan, who is advocating an anti-racist branch of the Education Ministry, says it's "shameful" that Premier Mike Harris cut an anti-racism education program in the schools.

The Conservatives' first priority is to raise standards in the public education system, says Johnson.

Over the next five years, he says, a Tory government plans to test teachers to make sure they have up-to-date skills, guarantee classroom funding, and test students on core subjects.

The Tories also plan to increase funding for health care by 20 percent, which "will guarantee that better services will be available when seniors need them."

The Conservatives have maintained and improved existing subsidized housing and have reinvested hundreds of millions of dollars to bring social housing back up to proper standards, says Johnson. "We have been reforming social housing…to ensure that those who need help get it."

In March, he says, the Harris government announced an additional $100 million to help the homeless in Ontario.

The government, says Johnson, has "zero tolerance for hate crimes and propaganda…and expects all authorities with jurisdiction over hate crimes on the Internet to prosecute offenders."

Bala-Krishnan, an electrical engineer who ran in Don Mills riding in 1995, says the NDP's policy is to support public schools and "bring back what has been taken away from the kids. We also view heritage language as an important part of the public school system."

Bala-Krishnan, who served with the Community Care Access Centre of North York, says that "clearly, the population in North York is aging, and seniors need services that are not being offered. Our party plans on providing culturally centred services, language services, and services for people of particular religious backgrounds.

"These are things that seniors now are not getting. The Community Care Access Centre as it stands, is not representative of the cross-section of Don Valley East."

The NDP is committed, she says, to building social housing, some co-op, some non-profit.

It also plans some type of housing for the homeless, and service-providing homes for psychiatric patients.

Having served on the Alliance for Employment Equity and as chair of the South Asian Women's Centre, Bala-Krishnan says she is well aware of the issue of hate crimes.

"The present government removed the anti-racist policies initiated by the NDP, and we plan on restoring them. We will reintroduce anti-racism education into the schools, and promote it in the workplace. The government also has to take initiatives to stop hate on the Internet."

Also running in the riding are Jeff Pancer for the Green party and Elizabeth Rowley for the Communist party.

Health care, education top Thornhill concerns

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Health care and education are seen as the main concern of voters in Thornhill riding, in next week's election.

Thornhill, which extends from Highway 400 to Highway 404, and from Steeles Avenue to Highway 7, was carved out of the former York Central and Markham ridings, held by Conservative MPPs Al Palladini and David Tsubouchi. About one-third of its population of 95,000 is estimated to be Jewish.

Conservative candidate Tina Molinari, 42, has served on the Catholic Separate School Board for the past 10 years, the last four as chair. Lawyer Dan Ronen, 35, is the Liberal candidate, while 19-year-old Nathan Rotman is carrying the NDP banner.

Early on in the campaign, Molinari had to do some fancy back-pedalling when a pollster asked whether residents would vote for a "member" of Canadian Jewish Congress, or for the son of a Holocaust survivor, both questions obviously referring to Ronen.

Molinari insists she did not commission the poll. The party apologized, and fired the pollster.

She told The CJN that while campaigning, she's discovering that people "believe in the direction the government is going," and support the tax cuts.

She said that while she believes "there is a benefit in children being educated in their faith," the party has taken no stand on extending funding to day schools. "We must strive to improve the public school system," she said.

Molinari insists that the Tories' policy of restructuring has led to more long-term care beds and more social housing. "We spend more than twice as much per capita as any other province," she said.

Under Attorney General Charles Harnick, she said, there has been more action on hate propaganda, including on the Internet, than ever before, a process that will continue. "Hate propaganda is intolerable. Proponents should be charged," she said.

Rotman agreed with the NDP stand against government funding of day schools, although he added that "it is not fair that only the Catholic schools are funded – it should be everyone or no one."

Asked about giving students in independent schools access to special services, such as speech therapy, he said it is a parent's personal choice to send a child to an independent school.

"The public school system here is great, even if it is being demolished [by the Conservatives]," he said.

Rotman feels Ontario must stop moving towards an American-style, for-profit social services system. "We must restore rent control, so that more housing is available, especially for seniors," he said.

While asserting the NDP is "anti-racist," he believes that the Internet is a federal issue.

Ronen is promising to bring the issue of school funding to party leader Dalton McGuinty and to the caucus. "I support it if it is universal, and if the schools meet Ministry of Education guidelines."

The Liberals, he said, besides injecting $2.1 billion into the health-care system, would investigate each health-care facility scheduled to close, and consult with the community.

"We need to ensure that our elderly feel safe and secure, and that health care will be there for them if they want it."

The party intends to impose legislation under which an employee can have 12 weeks unpaid leave of absence to care for an elderly relative.

While acknowledging "you can't stop hate," one way to stem it is through public education, in schools, and businesses.

Ronen and Rotman are also concerned about implementation of amalgamation in York Region, and the sale of Highway 407 to the private sector.

Former trustee running hard in Willowdale

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Redrawn boundaries in Willowdale riding mean there's probably a lower Jewish presence than before, and a significantly higher Asian population.

Ontario Election '99

The riding from which Attorney General Charles Harnick bowed out, now extends from Steeles Avenue to Chelmsford, Bathurst and the West Don River, along 401 to the East Don River, just east of Finch to Victoria Park Ave. and back to Steeles.

Liberal candidate Fahimeh Mortazavi, a human resources consultant with the federal government's public service commission, favors some provincial support for independent religious schools, including Jewish day schools.

"I realize the inequity and will raise this in caucus," she told The CJN.

Citing the rapidly growing number of seniors in the riding, Mortazavi opts for long-term elder care planning.

"We need to make sure that we have enough nurses and doctors." The Liberals, she states, are committed to increased funding for health care and education. The money would come from federal transfer payments, trimming the "top-heavy" provincial budget, which she says includes the cost of "high priced imported consultants," and re-allocation of current funds.

To promote affordable housing, the party would offer provincial sales tax rebates to builders on materials, and encourage Ottawa to do the same with the GST.

Liberal leader Dalton McGuinty is committed to restoring rent control, Mortazavi says.

She stresses early education to combat hate propaganda, and wants the message of the Holocaust emphasized. Hate on the Internet is frightening, she says, "because it's silent, a one-way communication with no dialogue.

"I'm all for freedom of the press but there should be a limit. If we don't allow hate propaganda in the newspapers, we shouldn't permit it on the Internet."

NDP candidate Mikael Swayze, a staff representative for the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE), is completing his PhD in political science at the University of Toronto, where he also teaches.

"I don't believe the state should fund independent schools," Swayze maintains. "I'm more in favor of a common public school system, despite the fact that our 16-month-old son is on the [waiting] list for Bialik [Hebrew Day School].

"My concern is that we could lose control of the curriculum and the way everything is taught if we accept government funding."

Swayze does support public help for special needs children, "to put everyone on the same field."

The Tories, he charges, dismantled the NDP plan to bring together all home care services in a seamless delivery under one umbrella.

"We've seen an incredible tendency to offer contracts to 'for-profit' organizations. The Americanization of health care makes it a business, not a public service. We would look to bringing in home care on a non-profit basis."

Social housing is a right, he insists, noting that the NDP would build 16,000 affordable housing units over the next four years, as called for by the Golden Commission on homelessness. The cost would be met by rolling back the tax cut for the top six percent of income earners.

Ontarians should work aggressively to prosecute those who violate anti-hate laws, says Swayze. He decries hate mongering on the Internet but declares that it's hard to regulate because its origins are decentralized.

David Young

Mikael Swayze

Fahimeh Mortazavi

The Progressive Conservative candidate, lawyer David Young, a former vice-chair of the North York Board of Education, says the government cannot undertake full funding for independent religious schools.

The party's priority, he says, is to ensure that public school systems have adequate funding, but he adds that Premier Mike Harris is prepared to investigate funding for health support services in all religious schools. "I'm doing work towards expending that," Young says.

Responding to elder care concerns Young states, "We have more geriatric specialists, the first Alzheimer's strategy in Ontario and expanded regional-care programs." Branson Hospital, he notes, will have 98 interim, long-term care beds.

Young wants to see the different levels of government work together to provide tax incentives to private organizations, like B'nai Brith, corporations and builders, to construct affordable housing.

"We have to be more relaxed toward zoning," he says, suggesting the conversion of unused buildings, like closed schools, for use as affordable living quarters.

A director of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, Young is committed to the battle against racism and believes it extends to opposing hate mongering on the Internet.

"It can be done through legislation which ensures that Internet providers in Ontario and North America can be prosecuted if they're involved in the propagation of this trash."

Elizabeth Rhodes is the candidate for the Green Party and Bernadette Michael is running as an independent.

UJA Mission Welcomes Ethiopian Jews to Israel

by Adi Neuberger

As a new chapter in the history of Ethiopian Jewry unfolds, 20 Torontonians were the first to meet with Quara Jews who arrived in Israel from Ethiopia just weeks ago.

The new immigrants are the first of an estimated 3,000 Jews waiting to be brought to Israel by the UJA Federation funded Jewish Agency. The final emigration of Quara Jews is expected to be completed by the end of the year.

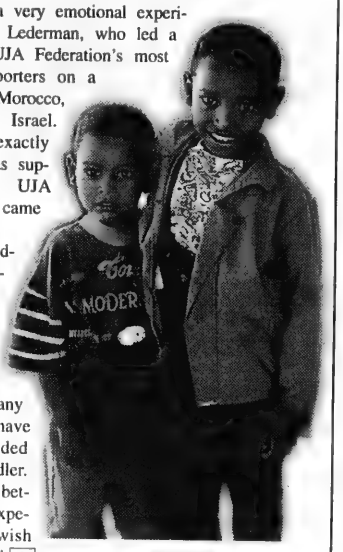
The latest group will join the more than 70,000 Jews of Ethiopian origin now living in Israel after being rescued from exile during the Jewish Agency's dramatic airlift operations in 1984 and 1991. The Quara Jews, living in remote regions of the country, were not included in Operation Moses and Operation Solomon.

UJA Federation supporters, including corporate partners, greeted the new arrivals at the Mevascret Zion absorption centre, outside Jerusalem, where the newcomers began their integration into Israeli society. Many parents who had sent their children on earlier flights were re-united with their families after months of separation.

"You could just tell by looking into their eyes how happy they are to be in Israel," noted Harold Lederman, who was in Israel to witness the arrival of the first wave of Ethiopian Jews during the early 80s.

The sole English-speaking adult in the group thanked the visitors for "helping us return home."

"It was a very emotional experience," said Lederman, who led a group of UJA Federation's most active supporters on a mission to Morocco, Paris and Israel. "This is exactly what we, as supporters of UJA Federation, came to see."



"It's incredibly satisfying and rewarding to know where our dollars go and how many people we have helped," added Eleanor Nadler. "There's no better way to experience Jewish peoplehood."

UJC APPOINTS AIN

New North American entity chooses Canadian leader

Steven Ain, Executive Vice-President of UIA Federations Canada, will become the second person from this country to lead the newly-created United Jewish Communities (UJC).

Ain was asked by fellow Canadian and UJC Chairman Charles Bronfman to serve as the interim Chief Operating Officer for six months to assist with the transition from three separate organizations - the Council of Jewish Federations, United Jewish Appeal and United Israel Appeal in the United States - into UJC.

Together with UJC Interim President and CEO Stephen Solender, Ain will help develop policy in four key areas: Jewish renaissance/renewal; human services and public policy; overseas needs; and campaign/financial resource development.

"This new entity will serve and respond to Jewish needs wherever they exist and will form a single continental voice for issues embodied in our four platforms," explains Ain, who, in addition to seven years as head of UIA Federations Canada, served as Executive Vice-President of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. In both prior positions, Ain traveled to Israel many times to assist the Jewish Agency, UJC's overseas partner, with its strategic planning.

UJC Executive Committee Chair Joel Tauber says Ain's more than 30 years of Jewish communal leadership will "prove invaluable in making the newly-merged entity an effective voice for the community."

"I am very excited to have the opportunity to help this new organization, representing North American Jewish communities, get up and running," says Ain, who will stay on at UIA Federations Canada on a part-time basis to help ensure a smooth transition while incoming Executive Director Maxyne Finkelstein assumes her post.

Loan Cassa Celebrates 75 Years

For three-quarters of a century, the Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa (TJFLC) has provided dignity and hope to thousands of people in need through interest-free loans.

Founded in 1924, to help newly-arrived Jewish immigrants start businesses and bring family members over from Europe, the Cassa remains steeped in the Maimonides philosophy of helping people to help themselves. Continuing its tradition, the TJFLC provides close to $1.5 million a year in interest-free personal, educational and business loans annually.

In recent years, the Cassa has assisted thousands of Jewish immigrants, including many from the former Soviet Union, as well as students, single mothers, the unemployed and those seeking a fresh start. Veteran Cassa volunteer Jerry Blitzer calls the agency "one of the Jewish community's best kept secrets."

"Most of our clients don't realize how long we've been helping people improve their lives," explains Blitzer, who is responsible for client follow-up and membership recruitment. "Many of our contributing members were clients at one time," says Blitzer. "Some of our former clients volunteer because they want to give something back."

"The banks and everyone else turned me down when I needed help," recalls Harry Greenblat, owner of Helpful Hands Inc. which provides transportation and homecare services in the Toronto area. "The Loan Cassa helped me keep my business afloat during some very lean times," adds Greenblat. "Even though I've paid back my loan, I still feel like I owe the Cassa a great deal."

Immigration consultant Raya Fridman went from working in a beauty salon to owning her own business thanks to a TJFLC business loan she received in 1992. A year earlier, a terrible car accident left Fridman, a single mother with no close relatives to lean on, unemployed until a friend told her about the Cassa. "I've always had a positive attitude but the Loan Cassa gave me the support I needed to get back on my feet," explains Fridman, who now chairs the Personal & Educational Loan Committee. "I find tremendous satisfaction in helping others and in being a part of such a wonderful organization."

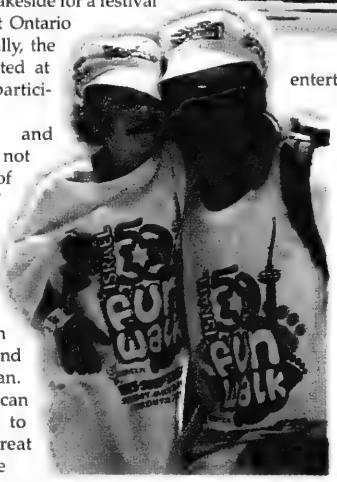
We're Ready To Walk!!

Thousands of walkers will wind their way through the city's core this Sunday as UJA Federation's Israel Funwalk 99, Jewish Toronto's largest annual event, takes to the streets.

Come rain or shine, Funwalk 99, from Nathan Phillips Square to Ontario Place, will begin at 10:30 a.m., Sunday, May 30, with a huge outdoor carnival in front of City Hall. Opening ceremonies include free rides for the kids, live musical entertainment with Liberty Silver and the Stars Band and a special appearance by singer Stephen Page of the Bare Naked Ladies.

Funwalk 99 participants will then head south through old Jewish Toronto, stopping at checkpoints for fun and refreshments along the way, before arriving lakeside for a festival and barbeque at Ontario Place. Historically, the Walk has attracted at least 10,000 participants.



"The fun and excitement do not stop at the end of the Walk," stresses Harvey Cooperberg who is co-chairing Israel Funwalk 99 with Corey Mandell and Fran Grundman. "Festival-goers can look forward to plenty of great kosher food, live entertainment and a lot of community spirit."

This year UJA Federation's recruitment team made special effort to attract walkers of all ages such as 81-year-old Rachel Kanner who is celebrating her 25th year as a Walk participant. "This my way of showing support to the State of Israel," says Kanner who raised $3,000 one year. "I'm very grateful to my generous sponsors who have lent me their support year after year."

Last year's record breaking event raised $250,000 for Jews in need.

Walk Runs Clothing Drive

Israel Funwalk 99 participants can take an important step toward helping Jews in need by bringing along an extra item or two of new or gently used clothing for the Jewish Family & Child Service clothing drive on Sunday, May 30.

The UJA beneficiary agency, which provides clothing directly to the needy through its Just-A-Second Shop, will be collecting clothing at Nathan Phillips Square, between 9:15 and 11:30 a.m. Donations should be brought to tables located under the Just-A-Second Shop - Jewish Family & Child Service banner near the registration area on the east side of the square.

"This is a great opportunity for the store to acquire urgently needed inventory," says Barbara Barak, Coordinator of JF&CS Volunteer Services. "If every walker brings just one item we could collect thousands of pieces of clothing in just one day."

After the Walk, donations can be brought to the Just-A-Second Shop, 4117 Bathurst Street, Monday-Thursday 11:00 a.m. - 6:00 p.m. and Sunday 11:00 a.m. – 3:00 p.m. or at donation boxes located in front of the store, the Bathurst Jewish Centre and at 7241 Bathurst Street in Thornhill.

Sponsorship Soars

It's a record-breaking year for Funwalk corporate sponsorships.

In just two years, the number of companies sponsoring the Jewish community's most popular annual event has increased from two to more than 25 including some of the biggest names in Canadian business.

Israel Funwalk 99 Co-Chair Fran Grundman credits its Walk cabinet members - a core group of volunteers - for obtaining additional support from the private sector. "They made many calls and worked long hours to reach as many businesses as possible," says Grundman. "We couldn't have pulled it all together without them."

"Some companies even came to us on their own because they realize how important this event is to our community," adds Grundman.

UJA Federation thanks the following sponsors for supporting Israel Funwalk 99. We apologize for inadvertently omitting some names due to our publication deadline.

Choir director celebrating 20 years at Beth Emeth

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The simple pleasure of hearing children sing is the aspect of his work Charles Heller enjoys the most.

The choir director at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue – who also works in the public school system as a Grade 6, 7 and 8 music teacher – will be honored at a synagogue breakfast next month on his 20th anniversary with the shul.

Heller, who was born in London, England in 1946, has a degree in biology from Cambridge University. He taught science at the Jews' Free School in London, but soon found his niche was in music, particularly conducting.

At Beth Emeth, he directs three choirs – a synagogue choir of men and boys, a community choir of men and women (the two-time award-winning Zemer Chorale), and a children's choir.

He has also worked closely with cantor emeritus Louis Danto as conductor, arranger and accompanist.

Heller set out on his career path at age 8 as a boy chorister at the Stoke Newington Synagogue in London. "It was the most natural thing for me," he recalls.

The product of a traditional Jewish home, Heller attended Hebrew school three times a week.

His late father, an electrician by training, was a tenor in the synagogue choir. A native of a small town in the Austro-Hungarian empire, he had fled his hometown, Polna, once the Nazis came to power. His family had been involved in synagogue life there since at least the 1780s, according to archival records Heller has found.

Heller's English-born mother, a dress designer, now 89 years old, also came from a family that was involved in the synagogue.

Charles Heller

Professional standards

Before joining Beth Emeth, Heller spent a year at Kitchener's Beth Jacob Congregation as cantor and teacher, following his immigration with his wife Helen and daughter Sarah in 1977.

Heller's work as a teacher enhances his work at the synagogue, and vice versa, he believes.

But unlike children at school, the boys in the Beth Emeth choir are held to professional standards.

"Choir is essentially a grown-up activity," said Heller. Children as young as 8 are expected to be on their best behavior for hours at a time and to work as part of a musical team with the cantor, doing a professional job, he explained.

"At school, all that's expected is that you try your best."

Over the years Heller has observed a "worldwide decline in getting kids to sing.

"It used to be every school, church and synagogue would have a choir. Very often [now] children feel uncomfortable singing because they've never been asked."

But it's "a very natural thing" to sing, insisted Heller. "It's a different kind of communication. There's something very human about it."

Conducting a choir at services is challenging, Heller said. "You've got to concentrate all the time. You've got to know everything the cantor is going to do, then everything the choir's going to do, and you've got to make sure they go together."

Among his fondest memories of his Beth Emeth career, is the time the Zemer Chorale braved a blizzard to sing at a downtown hospital. They have also performed at venues like Mel Lastman Square and the Canadian National Exhibition.

In his spare time, Heller serves as consulting editor and arranger for the Cantors Assembly of New York. He also served as vice-president of Jewish Music Toronto for four years and enjoys researching Jewish music, a subject he taught at the University of Toronto in the early 1980s.

Baroque Jewish music

He used musical fragments to reconstruct baroque Jewish music for the CD I Heard a Voice from Heaven. "The best baroque synagogue music was written for special occasions [like] Chanukah or weddings," he said. "You'd need a little orchestra, so it wasn't for holidays."

He sees his role in that area as "a kind of detective work. I'm very proud of the recording."

Scholarship winner hopes to help AIDS patients

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Eden Rosen

TORONTO — Last summer, Eden Rosen juggled two university courses and five volunteer commitments, including concurrent stints as a Jewish Hospice Program volunteer and at two hospital palliative care units, as well as at a hospice catering to AIDS patients.

A roller-blading accident in June, requiring hand surgery, barely slowed her down.

This fall the gregarious 22-year-old will enter Yeshiva University's Wurzweiler School of Social Work in New York.

To recognize her leadership qualities and commitment to community, the family of the late Stephen Cooper, who died in 1988 at age 18, has selected Rosen to receive its annual memorial scholarship given at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

"I found her very wise and sensitive for such a young age," said Adi Neuberger, a member of the award committee.

Rosen, who recently completed her BA in sociology at the University of Western Ontario, would like to return to Toronto once she completes her education, to serve the needs of AIDS patients in the Jewish community.

"Our community is so wonderful and so charitable," she said, citing the work of Jewish Family & Child Service and the many organizations that support Israel.

"I want to push it a little further and open our arms to people who are gay and who have AIDS."

It's difficult enough in everyday situations when people don't have family and tradition to turn to, but it's even harder when they're suffering, she explained.

In a thanatology (death and dying) course Rosen took at Western, there was much discussion about people turning to religion when they are sick or dying, she said.

A Jewish AIDS hospice is "so needed," she believes. "AIDS is an epidemic, and it's spreading."

Rosen was determined to get into the social work program.

"One of the reasons I want to help people who are stigmatized is that I was labeled too, although not to the same extent," she said, referring to a learning disability diagnosed when she was a youngster.

A graduate of Metropolitan Preparatory Academy, she relies on a variety of learning strategies, and attended Western on a scholarship, maintaining an A average all three years.

It was through her confirmation class at Temple Sinai that she got her first taste of community service at age 14, working with disabled children at Bloorview Children's Hospital (now part of the Bloorview MacMillan Centre).

"I've always wanted to help people," she said. Her parents, Noel and Heather, a physician and family therapist respectively, are both in the helping professions, she noted.

"Eden has always had this ability to relate to people who were different," said her mother. "When she was 5 or 6, she'd give money to the homeless."

At 15 she was friendly with a gay teen at an arts camp. She later discovered he was ill, likely with AIDS. "That was enough of a first experience to know I would have done anything in the world to help him," she said.

Rosen has also been affected by the death of a close friend at age 18, and by the deaths of several parents of friends.

Her only fear with respect to volunteering in palliative care, was of becoming depressed and not being able to shake it.

"I do get sad," she said. "I'm not by any means made of steel. I get so close to them, and they die, but society can't write these people off... It's so important to me to give them what they deserve."

When she meets people who have AIDS, Rosen endeavors to give them her friendship, her attention, her care and her "normalcy" in terms of how she approaches them.

"People with AIDS deal with multiple loss," she said. "It's unbelievable how much these people have lost, unbelievable how many families have distanced themselves, how many friends they've lost, and then they go to funerals twice or three times a month, or they can't go because they're too sick."

Rosen considers herself lucky to have met the patients she's worked with. "It's one more person you meet in life who obviously isn't taking life for granted and not taking you for granted. A really strong bond develops, and I cherish that."

Two Hamilton area ridings draw Jewish interest

By WENDY GOLDBLATT SCHNEIDER
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — In the upcoming provincial elections, the two ridings of greatest interest to the Hamilton and area Jewish community are Hamilton West and Wentworth-Burlington.

This is the first election since the provincial ridings were restructured. As a result, there are two incumbents running against each other in Hamilton West, namely Conservative MPP Lillian Ross, and New Democratic Party MPP David Christopherson. The third candidate is Liberal Frank D'Amico.

Running in Wentworth Burlington, which includes Ancaster, Dundas and Burlington, are Conservative MPP incumbent Toni Skarica, Liberal candidate Vicky Wylson Sher, and NDP candidate Jessica Brennan. Candidates from all three parties in this riding were asked to express their views on certain issues.

Ontario Election '99

On the question of funding for Jewish day schools, Skarica replied that while the Harris government does not support extending funding, he himself would support providing a tax credit for tuition fees.

Sher, the one Jewish candidate among those running, said that although the Liberal party supports the ideology of extending funding towards independent religious schools, their first priority is to restore stability to the existing public and separate school system.

Christopherson was unequivocal on this issue, saying the entire focus of public dollars on education should be in the public school system.

As for making health care funding readily available to students enrolled in Jewish day schools, all the candidates expressed their wholehearted support. Sher, who herself is the parent of a child with special needs, felt particularly strong about this issue.

With regard to the privatization of health care, Ross cited the large number of privately run facilities that provide excellent care. The objective, she said, is to make sure that seniors are looked after as well as possible. Skarica talked about his government's commitment to breaking the logjam in hospitals by creating more long-term beds. Sher cited her party's stand against privatization of health care, which, they believe, would lead to a two-tiered system.

Christopherson emphasized the NDP's steadfast opposition to privatization, referring to studies that have shown the private sector's need to increase the profit margin is accomplished by reducing wages.

The Conservative and Liberal candidates were in agreement that governments should not be in the business of building social housing units. But Ross and Skarica did say that the Harris government plans to offer tax incentives to builders of low income housing and a commitment of $50 million for rent supplements. Skarica added that he believes the ultimate solution to homelessness lies in a booming economy.

Sher said that rather than getting involved in the actual building of affordable housing, government should be working with business and community leaders to ensure there are enough units in place to help with this problem. The Liberals, she said, plan to establish an additional 7,500 community units for former psychiatric patients and patients with special needs, recognizing that a large number of the homeless come from those populations.

Christopherson took a different stand on this issue, saying the problem of providing adequate affordable housing cannot be solved without the government playing a role. He said people tend to forget that half of those who are on social assistance are kids, and the Harris government's declaration that their policies were going to create all kinds of affordable housing just didn't happen. An NDP government, he said, would provide 6,000 units of affordable housing as well as 4,000 units of supportive housing for de-institutionalized psychiatric patients.

The question, he said, is "Do we have enough caring and enough compassion to say there are dollars within our budget that will go to affordable housing, or do we continue to see more and more people sleeping on our streets."

Ottawa doctor helps Kosovo refugees in Trenton

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — When planeloads of refugees began arriving in Canada, rheumatologist Dr. Rose Goldstein spent a weekend at the Trenton military base.

Goldstein, whose parents are both Holocaust survivors, said, "With my history, I would help any people in need. I am the volunteering type; I feel that if I can help in such a situation, I will.

"They made it easy for me to help because it was all organized. I just had to offer the services that I know how to provide."

The idea of organizing medical teams to assist the military in processing newly arrived refugees began with Dr. Peter Walker, an endocrinologist and dean of the faculty of medicine at Ottawa University, who suggested to a Health Canada official that the faculty might be able to help with the relief effort.

An organizing committee was formed, but when the planes began to arrive, says Walker, "we had maximum 72 hours' notice to get the first team down there. The team provided feedback on a regular basis," as they were basically learning on the job.

Open arms

"The organization by the military on the ground was superb, and they welcomed our people with open arms," said Walker.

Medical teams are being sent to Trenton in rotating shifts every 48 hours, to meet the planes, do triage at the airport, deal with any medical emergencies, and interview and examine the refugees.

Walker said he was impressed with the spontaneous outpouring of support by the doctors, nurses and medical students.

"I have not heard anyone address the issue of compensation, but if there is to be any, the volunteers want to give it back to the refugees. I think everyone who has gone has found it rewarding personally, professionally and spiritually."

Goldstein, team leader for a group of 20 nurses, doctors and medical students, said that when 250 people of all ages, including many children, got off the plane, "you could hear a pin drop. It was eerie. They were carrying nothing. They arrived with the shirts on their backs."

The immigration screening included chest x-rays and immunization. "Then they were given fresh new bathrobes and toiletries; they had showers and received packages of new clothing.

Shell-shocked

"The packages reminded me of the packages my parents received from the American Red Cross when they were liberated.

"Seeing the faces of the people, seeing how they were dressed and sunburned from exposure, many dehydrated and shell-shocked...to see so many people walk off a plane with nothing, was very emotional. Among the refugees were medical students, doctors and nurses; they come from every walk of life.

"When I returned home, I was exhausted. Even our team of 20 people didn't know each other when we started. It was really a challenge to help each other and make it work, but we formed a strong bond and most of us are anxious to return for another stint," says Goldstein.

In the May 7 issue of the CJN, we discussed Bracklow, in which Madame Justice McLaughlin of the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that Mrs. Bracklow was entitled to spousal support by virtue of need, even though this need was not caused by the marriage.

Justice McLaughlin referred the issue of "quantum" back to the trial judge, but stated that in determining the support amount, a Judge must consider many factors, such as need and ability to pay. Most surprisingly, the Court also ruled that the "conduct" of the one or both of the spouses could be a legitimate consideration in determining the amount to be awarded, even though Section 15.2 of the Divorce Act says the opposite — i.e. that a party's conduct is irrelevant.

Potential hornets' nest

Does this mean that an adulterous husband could be penalized by a greater amount of support awarded against him because he committed adultery? Does a spouse who supposedly failed to shop or clean the house adequately pay or receive more or less support? This is frankly a troubling implication, and I respectfully submit that Her Honour probably never intended for it to be interpreted accordingly. If this is now the new law of Canada, then it could obviously inflame litigation between divorcing couples (e.g. "What do you mean she wants $1,000 monthly? She's been yelling at me for three years! You go tell that Judge ....!" and so on.

Now, how wise are these trends? Do they really ultimately help all Canadian separated women in need? Or in virtually all such cases, is society simply shifting responsibility from the State (i.e. Welfare, Canada Pension Plan) to the income-earning spouse (usually the male, since there are comparatively few male recipients)?

And how practical and useful is it to disadvantaged women in need when such a shift is made? Clearly, Bracklow helps those women whose husbands obey Court orders and agreements. However, practically speaking, in many cases women must rely on their provincial governments to collect the spousal support that has been ordered.

Without the cooperation of their husbands, collection has become a nightmare for far too many, particularly where the spouses ordered to pay don't pay and are either self-employed (where they can bury their income "underground") or become deliberately underemployed.

In Ontario, it is not uncommon for women to confront an overworked and underfunded bureaucracy called the Family Responsibility Office that works best when its computers simply deduct the support owing from part of an employee's paycheque or suspend a payer's driver's license or passport. But the moment a payer evades payment, women are often stuck with Court orders or agreements that are useless since there are often insufficient resources to enforce them or, at the very least, these resources are applied inconsistently.

In Ontario, by law, a recipient is not even permitted to collect the support owing to her by hiring her own lawyer and seeing a Judge without getting her ex-partner's agreement to take enforcement out of the government's hands, or at least partly out of its hands. And why would the payer agree to do so if he has no intention to pay? He can be reasonably confident that the government will take its time or fail to find his hidden assets or undisclosed income. Even if the government does, on occasion, take drastic steps such as commencing jail proceedings or even suspending driver's licenses, that does not automatically lead to payment.

In other words, whether through Welfare or more expensive enforcement procedures, in many cases the taxpayer may ultimately pay for divorced women in need. However, for many disadvantaged women, direct government assistance that is delivered in a timely manner (i.e. every two weeks) through Welfare or other programs is far more secure than hoping that some provincial enforcement agency will some day succeed in collecting on a Court order or agreement. (We lawyers call these "Paper Judgements".)

"Show me the money!"

So, before women gleefully embrace these trends in law that appear to be in their favour, they may wish to think practically and say: "O.K., now show me the money!" It will take a combination of this new legal régime of support, more aggressive and efficient enforcement administration by governments, the ability to enforce an order or agreement privately (at least in part), and continued public assistance before society can financially secure all disadvantaged women. Meanwhile, the decision in Bracklow alone will only help certain women with husbands who do not evade their legal responsibilities.

In the June 17 issue we'll discuss how Bracklow will affect men.

Canadian fascination with last week's Israeli election is remarkable. Television networks ran prime-time programming on the event during the day and the print media featured extensive coverage and analysis in both the lead-up to the election and in the days following One Israel's convincing victory.

Talk about the Jewish state has dominated conversation in the nation's capital.

Officials at the Department of Foreign Affairs cheered the results almost as lustily as the most ardent kibbutznik.

It has long been their view that Benjamin Netanyahu was the single (only?) important obstacle to a comprehensive Israel-Palestine peace treaty. That view, shared by Canada's Foreign Minister, has been the source of increasing tension between the Jewish community and the federal government.

The expectation is that the new Israeli government will move dramatically ahead in resolving the outstanding issues between Israel and her various Arab neighbors, especially the completion of the final phase of negotiations with the Palestinians.

Every reasonably informed Canadian Jew, however, knows that issues like Jerusalem, Israeli settlements in the occupied West Bank and security guarantees do not lend themselves to an easy resolution.

Curiously, the only people in the political sector who have greeted the results of this election in a restrained fashion are those politicians who have actually travelled to the region.

They have seen firsthand the narrow silhouette of Israel's borders before the Six Day War, the strategic significance of the Golan mountain range and the proximity of the Lebanese border to Israel's northern communities. Therefore, they appreciate the difficulty of the situation facing the new Israeli premier – any Israeli premier, for that matter.

The Jewish community should draw two conclusions from the above. First, the trips it sponsors for parliamentarians to travel to Israel are effective and essential for advancing its pro-Israel interests. Second and more ominous, the tensions attributed to the previous Israeli administration may be marginally ameliorated, but not eliminated.

The Jewish community had better prepare itself for some difficult battles over the coming months if it hopes to influence official Canadian thinking on the "gut" issues of the Final Status negotiations.

Election reaction is muted in the Arab world

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Arab world's reaction to Ehud Barak's victory was relatively muted, with responses ranging from hope to suspicion.

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak was the first to place a congratulatory phone call to Barak.

Egyptian Foreign Minister Amr Moussa, speaking at a press conference in Cairo, said Barak "can rely on Egypt" to help with Israel's peace negotiations with the Palestinians, Lebanon and Syria.

"Egypt is ready to work toward changing the general atmosphere here in the Middle East, which has been heavily poisoned during the last three years, especially in recent months," Moussa said.

The editorial in the Syrian state-controlled newspaper Tashrin called the regime of Benjamin Netanyahu a "three-year nightmare."

The paper called on Barak to "make drastic changes in Israel's positions regarding a full withdrawal from occupied Arab lands and a just and inclusive peace based on UN resolutions."

Barak wrote Syrian President Hafez al-Assad a letter in August 1997, expressing his commitment to the late Yitzhak Rabin's maxim that "the extent of the withdrawal will depend on the extent of the peace."

The news of Barak's victory was given relatively short shrift in most of Syria's newspapers, although The Syria Times expressed optimism regarding Barak's past statements on Palestinian statehood, Syria and a Golan withdrawal.

The general uncertainty as to Barak's precise intentions was captured in a cartoon published on Monday in the state-controlled Jordanian paper Al-Ra'i. The cartoon, titled Barak-yahu, showed a face that was Barak's on the bottom and Netanyahu's on the top.

Jordanian officials expressed cautious optimism at Barak's victory. Deputy Prime Minister Marwan Hamoud said Jordan believes Barak is capable of breathing new life into the peace process, but added, "Of course, everything depends on the government he puts together."

Some Jordanian opposition leaders said they were not sure they could tell the difference between the incumbent and the prime minister-elect.

An announcer on Radio Iran said he was certain there was no difference between Barak and Netanyahu.

In Lebanon, Hezbollah Secretary General Hassan Nasrallah said any Israeli premier will have to decide whether to withdraw from Lebanon unilaterally, without preconditions.

Lebanese premier Selim al Haas said all of Israel's wars with Arab nations came when the Labor party was in power.

Meanwhile, according to Yasser Arafat's aide, Nabil Abu Rudeyna, Barak, in a telephone conversation with the Palestinian Authority (PA) chairman, has promised that the peace process would be revived.

"In the course of their phone call, Arafat and Barak promised to continue with the peace process,"the aide said.

Palestinian reactions to Barak's victory ranged from cautious optimism to condemnation of the new leader as "more of the same."

After the exit polls were announced, Arafat told reporters: "I respect the results of the elections in Israel and praise Ehud Barak."

Asked whether he thought Barak's ascendancy was a victory for the peace process itself, Arafat responded, "I hope so."

Hamas' spiritual leader, Sheikh Ahmed Yassin, was far less sanguine about the change.

"The victory of the terrorist, Ehud Barak, will not change a thing," he said.

"Barak is located on the political map to the right of the Labor Party and he is one of its extremist hawks. His past also is steeped in the blood of our people," Yassin said, in a press statement.

"The Likud and One Israel are identical parties," the statement added.

Yasser Abed Rabbo, the PA's minister of information and culture, took the middle ground.

"The Palestinians and the Arabs must not rush to celebrate Barak's victory," he said. "First of all, we must observe the policies he actually pursues," he told French reporters.

Barak's victory speeches, meanwhile, earned the prime minister-elect a chilly reception from top Palestinian negotiator and cabinet minister Saeb Erekat, who found fault with Barak's statement on Jerusalem as "the eternal and united capital of Israel."

Incoming Knesset has record numbers of women, immigrants and factions

By GIDEON ALON
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The incoming 120-member Knesset will set records for the number of factions, as well as the number of women and recent immigrants joining the legislative assembly as members.

Only 11 parties constituted the outgoing 14th Knesset, while no fewer than 15 parties will now be represented.

The number of women entering the next Knesset s also unprecedented. Fourteen women will become members of the 15th Knesset, a sharp increase from the nine female MKs who served in the last Knesset.

Until last week's elections, the 13th Knesset, with 12 female MKs, had had the largest number of women serving in any Knesset.

There is also a dramatic increase in the number of recent immigrants from the former Soviet Union serving in the 15th Knesset. That number has risen from seven in the 14th Knesset to 11.

Besides Yisrael b'Aliyah, which served in the previous Knesset, the new party identified with the immigrant community, Yisrael Beitenu, will also be represented in the next Knesset.

Arab parties also increased their numbers. A total of 12 MKs from minority groups, which is up from nine, will serve in the 15th Knesset. Until now, the ninth Knesset with 10 minority members, had had the largest number from this group.

Instead of two Arab parties (Hadash and the Democratic Arab Party) the incoming Knesset will have 10 representatives from three parties identified with the Arab sector – the United Arab List (five seats), Hadash (three), and Balad (two).

The party that had the greatest proportional increase in MKs undoubtedly is Shas, which improved its standing by 70 percent. It rose from 10 to 17 seats. Shas first made its appearance in the 11th Knesset with four seats. The party won 10 seats during the 1996 elections.

Shinui also dramatically improved its position, having grown from one to six seats.

The country's traditionally larger parties, Labor and Likud, both took a beating from the voters. Labor's new incarnation, One Israel, will enter the new Knesset with 27 seats, which is down from 34.

That represents the lowest number of seats to be held by the largest left-leaning party since the creation of the state. The lowest number of Labor members to hold seats in the Knesset prior to last week's vote was 32, in the ninth Knesset.

Likud with only 19 seats, suffered an even stronger blow, losing nearly half of the 32 seats it had held in the 14th Knesset. The last time the party had so low a proportion of seats was the Fifth Knesset.

Neither Tsomet nor The Third Way crossed the threshold to win a single seat.

Composition of the 15th Knesset

Following are the projected number of seats won by Israel's political parties in the incoming 15th Knesset. Numbers in parentheses indicate a party's representation in the outgoing Knesset.

Labor's One Israel Coalition – 27 (Labor alone had 34)
Likud – 19 (32)
Shas – 17 (10)
Meretz – 9 (9)
Yisrael b'Aliyah – 7 (7)
Shinui – 6 (new party)
Centre – 6 (new party)
National Religious Party – 5 (9)
United Torah Judaism – 5 (4)
United Arab List – 5 (4)
Israel, Our Home – 4 (new party)
National Unity – 3 (new party)
Hadash – 3 (5)
National Democratic Alliance – 2 (new party)
One Nation – 2 (new party)

New landscape emerges from election rubble

By DAVID LANDAU
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Pundits everywhere are calling Israel's election results a political earthquake.

In fact, two distinct tremors have indeed overturned the rules and realities that have governed the Jewish state and its policy-making for the past three years.

Labor party leader Ehud Barak's 56 percent to 44 percent victory over outgoing prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu, signifying the collapse of the "Greater Israel" ideology, is a seismic shift that has brought undisguised joy from leaders around the world.

But the massive success of the haredi Shas party, which draws predominant support from Israel's Sephardi population, is also an earthquake.

Shas scored the most dramatic victory in last Monday's voting for the Knesset, boosting its representation from 10 seats in the outgoing Knesset to a projected 17 seats in the new legislature. The gain makes it one of the "Big Three" in the Knesset alongside the much-reduced Likud and Labor factions.

Given that Shas' strident election campaign focused almost exclusively on the four-year sentence for bribery and corruption recently imposed on its leader, Aryeh Deri, the party's victory, on the face of it, is a victory for the anti-court and anti-establishment rhetoric that its leaders espoused.

Deri announced last Tuesday that he was resigning as a Knesset member and withdrawing from political life, a move that could clear the way for coalition negotiations between Barak and Shas.

But on a deeper level, Shas' triumph dramatically illustrates the daunting task facing Barak in his quest, as he proclaimed on election night, for "unity, brotherhood and a healing of the rifts" that have threatened to tear apart Israeli society.

Ironically, it was Netanyahu's close alliance with Shas that, probably more than any other single factor, brought on his crushing defeat.

As the election campaign neared its climax – and especially after Deri's sentencing in April and Shas' vociferous rejection of the ruling – it became increasingly clear that Netanyahu's "coalition of the non-elites," as opposed to the "elitism" he ascribed to Labor's traditional Ashkenazi following, was splitting at the seams.

The vast immigrant community from the former Soviet Union bridled at finding themselves lumped together in Netanyahu's governing coalition with a convicted felon whose followers were threatening the judges who had found him guilty.

Yisrael b'Aliyah, the immigrant rights party led by Natan Sharansky, brilliantly turned this sentiment to its electoral advantage by running a catchy campaign directed against Shas' control of the Interior Ministry.

Shas officials, Yisrael b'Aliyah claimed, used their power in that ministry to harass and discriminate against immigrants whose Jewish status, under religious law, was deemed uncertain or unsatisfactory.

In the month before polling day, tens, probably hundreds, of thousands of immigrants shifted their support from Netanyahu, who was perceived to be in the thrall of Shas, to Barak, whose election promise was, "I will not bow to extremists."

On the morning after, however, all election promises must undergo searching re-examination under the harsh light of the new Knesset arithmetic.

Knesset arithmetic

Shas' 17 "extremists" are not, arguably, as easily dismissed as 10. In practical terms, Barak will find it hard to set up a stable government without either Shas or Likud. On paper, he can possibly do it. But the patchwork of agreements with tiny factions that this would entail is a recipe for grief.

Granted, his theoretical ability to do without Likud and Shas will lend him strength in his negotiations with one or both of these factions as he moves forward in forming a coalition government.

Projected Knesset results give Barak several possible allies to choose from in the 45 days he now has to form that government: The Meretz party, Yisrael b'Aliyah, Shinui, a party that says all haredi parties should be kept out of the next government, the Centre party (the new grouping headed by Yitzhak Mordechai, who dropped out of the race for prime minister a day before elections), and the National Religious Party (NRP).

If the NRP agrees to enter an otherwise secularist and left-of-centre coalition, this would give Barak something of the unifying "rainbow effect" that he has pledged to strive for.

Nevertheless, his larger goal of reconciliation would seem to dictate a pact with Shas or Likud, and most pundits believe he will try to include one of them in his coalition.

Each, however, holds out major problems for Barak.

Meretz, a natural Barak ally, has issued a firm declaration that it would refuse to join any government with Shas. In this, Meretz is following the lead of another election success story, the avowedly anti-Orthodox Shinui party.

Barak needs one or both of these factions inside his tent. But how can he get them there and have Shas inside, too? Indeed, within Barak's own party there is a strong body of opinion opposing a deal with Shas.

During his victory address at Rabin Square on the evening of the election, Barak was confronted with placards demanding: "Not the haredim," and the huge throng picked up that slogan and shouted it at Barak and his leadership team.

But Labor Knesset member Yossi Beilin has left the door open for negotiations with Shas, saying that Labor had ruled out negotiating with Shas only if Deri remained at its head.

Barak himself had pledged not to negotiate with Deri since the Shas leader's conviction. But this obstacle has been removed, because Deri, a historic victory under his belt, has stepped down to prepare his appeal and allow others to run the party for the meantime.

The Likud, smarting from its defeat and reeling under Netanyahu's swift resignation, will now undergo a grueling leadership battle.

The political persuasion of the new leader may prove a determining factor in whether Likud is prepared to make the doctrinal compromises necessary for a partnership with Labor.

For their part, Barak and his team are not prepared for a unity government that is in effect a government of paralysis, which was the case for the governments that ruled from 1984 to 1990.

His resounding victory in the vote for prime minister gives him the perfect right to insist that any coalition must follow One Israel's lead.

Two likely Likud leadership contenders, Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert and outgoing Finance Minister Meir Sheetrit, are seen as relative pragmatists.

But hard-liner Ariel Sharon seems to be preparing a leadership bid as well, and this could spell the end of any possible alliance with Barak.

"I don't know Hebrew."

"I don't know the Torah."

"I don't know Jewish history."

"I'll never get into a Jewish Day School."

These Jewish High Schools are committed to proving her wrong.

The preconceptions abound. If you don't have a strong Jewish background, if you don't know Hebrew, if you're not familiar with Jewish history, then a Jewish High School is not for you.

But fortunately, preconceptions are often wrong.

The High Schools listed here all have Jewish Enrichment Tracks, funded in part by AVI CHAI and designed specifically for students who are entering a Jewish Day School for the first time. These students will be receiving the outstanding secular education offered by Day Schools. At the same time they will be studying the basics of Hebrew and Jewish texts, enabling them to participate in Jewish Studies classes at grade level, with confidence and knowledge.

Jewish Enrichment Tracks are just another facet of the emerging Jewish Day School movement. A movement that is blending critical thinking, morality, spirituality and a deep knowledge of the core texts of our heritage.

Other posters, stickers and flyers that littered the country's streets during the campaigning period were slowly being cleared away.

As for Netanyahu's resignation from politics, no one was really surprised he was stepping down but rather that he announced his departure when he did. His departure from the Likud was necessary for the party to rebuild itself. Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon took over on a temporary basis allowing likely candidates to prepare for the battle of top spot.

Those jockeying for the Likud top job include Communications Minister Limor Livnat, Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert, Finance Minister Meir Shetrit, and Science Minister Silvan Shalom.

Israel's much anticipated Election Day has passed. Now Israelis are looking to Barak to turn a new leaf, to lead a new government that does not rely on, and encourage rifts between its citizens.

"Israel returned to itself yesterday, casting out the man who threw a challenge in its face," wrote Ofer Shalach, a reporter with the Israeli paper Maariv. "The work of healing begins with creating a broad government – with the Likud, without Netanyahu."

Parents urged to use 'no' properly with kids

BY CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

Natural need to establish power

VAUGHAN — The "no" word is one of the most important concepts a child has to learn, says a child and adolescent psychiatrist with the Centre for Addictions and Mental Health – Clarke Site.

"Children need to push limits. They need to understand the boundaries of the world by confronting authority," Dr. Umesh Jain said at a recent discussion sponsored by Jewish Family and Child Service York Region office, Rosedale Heights Public School and Janssen-Ortho Inc.

If the word no is used inappropriately, he said, then a child will learn to hate it. "That means he will not apply it to himself, and that, in turn, leads to impulsive behavior. A child who can accept the no word is a child who has self-control. Too much respect for the no word, however, can make a child rigid."

To use the no word, properly, he said, "we can't just say, no, stop or don't. That gives the child too narrow an interpretation. Tell him to stop banging the spoon on the table, and he'll bang it on the floor. You should tell him to use the spoon to eat his dinner. Then he knows how to interpret what you've said."

A child has a natural need to establish power, said Jain, and giving him limited choices are a way of giving him a semblance of power. "It allows the child to feel in control; it gives him a belief of power. Don't tell him he is having cereal for breakfast. Ask him if he wants cereal or toast. Then, he is making the decision. He feels powerful."

A child's destructive behavior is intensified, he said, if he senses that his parents are vulnerable. "If he's worried about the strength at the top, then he is going to do something to test that strength. Oppositional behavior stems out of a child being insecure about his environment."

Changes such as deaths, losses or moves change a child's security, he said, and force oppositional behavior. "Strong parents can preempt that behavior. Strength at the top gives kids a feeling of safety and security."

For parents to regain power, said Jain, they must be able to ignore simple, bad behavior. "If you don't look at bad behavior, it will escalate, and then it will stop. At first the child will respond to being ignored by intensifying his behavior, but eventually he'll grow tired of it."

The next step, he said, is to communicate with your child in a way that establishes your power. "Talk in a firm, calm, positive way that puts you in command. Force yourself to think of alternative behavior. Don't think about what you want your child to stop doing, but rather, what you would like him to do, and make that known, calmly and positively."

Jain stressed that if you look at behaviour, good or bad, it will escalate. "Give a lot of attention to good behavior. Catch your child being good."

About Nutrition

Q. With strawberry season around the corner, I am wondering about their nutritional value.

A. Strawberries get an A+ for nutritional value. Strawberries contain only 50 calories and one gram of fat in a one cup serving, along with a healthful dose of fibre and more than 100 percent of your average daily requirement of Vitamin C.

Q. I always hear people talking about their cholesterol levels. What is an appropriate number?

A. The number will vary slightly, based on age. An average ideal number for Canadians is 5 to 5.2 total cholesterol. However, this number alone tells us very little about your risk and actual cholesterol status. What is essential to know is the breakdown of numbers that make up this total number. You should always ask your doctor or dietitian to explain to you your values for HDL, good cholesterol, LDL, bad cholesterol, and triglycerides.

Sometimes the interpretation of these numbers greatly changes the way the total number appears. Also, the necessary dietary interventions are very different, depending on which values require improvement.

Q. I commonly hear people saying that they are trying to cut down on their carbohydrate servings. On labels, carbohydrates are expresses in grams. How many grams constitute one serving?

A. Fifteen grams of carbohydrate constitute one serving. Six to 11 servings per day are recommended for Canadians, depending on their age, size and activity level.

Grey to headline fundraiser

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Joel Grey

TORONTO — Whether he is belting out Romania, Romania, playing the lead in his award winning role as the MC in Cabaret, or singing a Yiddish song made famous by his father, vaudeville great Mickey Katz, Joel Grey's enthusiasm, vitality and boyish demeanor have not waned in almost six decades.

Grey will be the headliner at the Ashkenaz fundraiser, Kensington Cabaret. The gala black tie dinner and English/Yiddish musical extravaganza will be held at the Sheraton Centre, Grand Ballroom on June 17.

Hinda Silber, chair of the Ashkenaz gala committee, said the funds raised will support the Ashkenaz summer festival of Yiddish/Jewish culture running from Aug. 30 to Sept. 6 at Harbourfront Centre.

The fundraising dinner will include a silent auction, and the backdrop will be reminiscent of world of the '30s and '40s.

"The ballroom will be decorated with elements from our ancestors' Kensington Market-Spadina Avenue past. Guests will stroll into the past," Silber said.

In a telephone interview from Los Angeles where he is completing A Christmas Carol, a special for the Hallmark Hall of Fame to be aired in December, Grey said he is "excited and overwhelmed" with the concept of Ashkenaz. "I would like to come back for Ashkenaz this summer," he added.

Grey, who began performing at the age of nine, said he has "very fond memories of Canada. One of my first professional performances was with my father in Vancouver when I was a teenager."

He was recently in Vancouver again to shoot an episode of the television series, Outer Limits.

"I remembered that first appearance in Canada with my father and my many forays to Canada when Cabaret played in Vancouver and at the O'Keefe Centre in Toronto, where it had the biggest box office ever to that time," he said.

Grey was born in Cleveland before the Katz family moved to Los Angeles. He said everyone on the Katz side of the family sang, danced, or did both.

"My dad reflected the immigrant experience," he said.

With a revival of Yiddish, Grey said there is "so much interest in my father's material; there is a new respect and reverence. My dad's comedy and music have more clarity and seriousness now in looking at the immigrant experience."

He noted that his father's material is being sold through the Internet and it is becoming more and more recognized.

He said he always includes some of his father's material in his performances, adding that he has a keen respect for the past and likes to connect with his roots.

Speaking of his appearance at the Ashkenaz fundraiser, Grey said, "I think you have to know about the past in order to go forward. If people are not aware of their roots, I think it is a stumbling block to becoming a full person."

Grey is very involved with Yiddishkeit, although he described his Yiddish language skills as "food Yiddish and humor Yiddish."

He got his first big break with comedian Eddie Cantor, who hired him to perform on his television show, The Colgate Comedy Hour. He went on to win a Tony for his role as the MC in the musical Cabaret and an Oscar in 1972 for the movie version.

He replaced Anthony Newley in Neil Simon's Come Blow Your Horn, appeared with the San Francisco Symphony Pops, and went on to star in the musical hit Chicago.

Grey, who is 5 foot 5, has tackled virtually every medium of entertainment – stage, screen, nightclub, concerts and television.

In 1985, he received a star on Hollywood's Walk of Fame, and in 1994, he was inducted into the Theatre Hall of Fame in New York.

He is proud of his two children. Jennifer is an actress (Dirty Dancing) who is starring in the TV series, It's Like You Know, and son James is a chef in Hollywood's swank Les deux Cafe.

Quibble aside, Patinkin impeccable

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One quibble with Mandy Patinkin's Mamaloshen concert – the English explanation of each Yiddish number consists of a mere sentence or phrase projected on a banner.

Without a more complete translation, or perhaps an explanation of some of the more colorful phrases, a large segment of the audience misses out on the linguistic richness of the songs.

Then again, as one audience member commented at last week's Toronto concert, held May 17 at the Hummingbird Centre, Patinkin would be worth hearing even if he sang the phone book.

Technically, his work is impeccable – or close to it. Accompanied by his longtime pianist Paul Ford and, in a few numbers, by nimble-fingered violinist Saeka Matsuyama, Patinkin used his broad vocal range – from rich bass baritone to delicate falsetto – advantageously.

The Mamaloshen portion of the 110-minute concert draws exclusively from his 1998 CD of the same name, a mix of Yiddish standards and songs by American Jewish composers, translated into Yiddish.

Patinkin, who grew up in Chicago not knowing any Yiddish, is in the process of learning more Yiddish songs, he said.

"I will never let this die till the day I die," he vowed.

The concert began on a restrained note with the lullaby Rozhinkes Mit Mandlen, followed by Mayn Mirl, a love song better known in English as Leonard Bernstein and Stephen Sondheim's Maria, from West Side Story.

Dressed in his trademark all-black – his t-shirt paired for this event with a tuxedo instead of more casual attire – Patinkin interspersed his performance with snippets of Paul Simon's American Tune, mostly in English, to provide a framework and convey the immigrant experience.

For the audience, a goodly number of whom were of Eastern European Jewish origin, Patinkin's Yiddish renditions of Supercalifragilisticexpialidocious and Take Me Out To The Ball Game provided a delightful change of pace.

Equally adept as an actor and a singer, the Emmy and Tony award winner – best known to youngsters as Inigo Montoya in The Princess Bride – put his acting skills to use, hamming it up plenty in some songs, to transcend language barriers.

His eclectic Yiddish repertoire included the old standard Oyfn Pripetshik, Motl Der Opreyter about a young family man killed in a sweatshop workers' strike, a song about the doomed Titanic, and, of all things, Irving Berlin's White Christmas.

A set of popular American tunes followed, including selections from his upcoming CD, Kidults, "an album for children of all ages," to be recorded next month.

"Because we have been on the road, we have not had very much time to rehearse," said Patinkin, 46, holding the music in his left hand

Location manager smooths way for Lost Tribes shoot

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When the 1997 Donald Brittain Award, the prestigious documentary award at the Geminis, was presented to Bill Cobben, director of The Selling of Innocents, Cobben made a point of singling out the work of location and production manager Felix Golubev.

The Selling of Innocents, the film that netted Cobben and co-producers Elliott Halpern and Simcha Jacobovici that prize, is about illegal child prostitution in India. It was shot entirely on location in India, and Golubev, 39, had to organize all the logistics pertaining to the shoot.

Aside from the responsibility of feeding, housing and transporting the crew, he had to prepare the locations. This entailed finagling with the authorities to film a Bombay brothel and a Nepalese jail, smuggling cameras into Nepal, and orchestrating a raid on a brothel in conjunction with the local police.

Golubev's mettle was also relentlessly tested in Jacobovici's most recent production, Quest for the Lost Tribes of Israel, which will be screened at a fundraiser for the Riverdale Jewish Community at the Music Hall, 147 Danforth Ave. at 2 and 7 p.m. on June 6.

Lost Tribes, chronicling Jacobovici's quest for the Israelite tribes, was shot in remote regions in India, Pakistan, Afghanistan and Uzbekistan.

Golubev, the production and location manager for most of the filming, has many stories to tell about the behind-the-scenes adventures he and the crew experienced in the wild east.

The Russian-born Golubev immigrated to Canada in 1984 and later graduated from Ryerson Polytechnic University's television program. He said growing up in a Communist regime helped prepare him for productions in "precarious locations where access is difficult and the local authorities are not cooperating.

"I do all the local contacts…I make sure everything is running smoothly. When you live in Russia, you learn survival skills. It teaches you to be savvy and street-smart.

"Lots of Third World countries have similarities [to Russia]. I can see things that the Canadian don't see. I speak the same psychological language as the locals. We understand each other."

Bargaining for hotels and transportation is a big part of his job, Golubev said. "You can't be naive. It's very easy to be ripped off. People see the cameras and they think it's Hollywood. Documentaries have small budgets…You can't waste a lot of money."

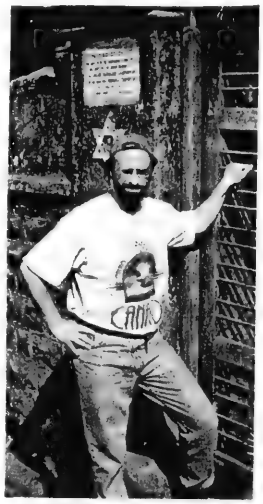
And because resources are limited, he has to get the film footage as quickly as possible. He travels ahead of the crew to work out the kinks and to develop contacts with local people, he said.

"You have to assess the situation quickly. You fish around for sources. You're constantly looking for sources. You drink tea with a person and you think, 'How is that person going to advance your cause?'"

And there are times when it is necessary to "misrepresent yourself," Golubev noted, explaining that all the footage from Uzbekistan in Lost Tribes was shot illegally.

He said the crew would have been denied permission to shoot in Uzbekistan if he had revealed the true subject of the film. And so he spent months in Canada making contacts with government officials. Uzbekistan was like home turf for him, and he knew how to circumvent the bureaucratic roadblocks, he said.

From Canada, Golubev contacted the Uzbekistan minister of information, telling him that the Canadian crew would be doing a "National Geographic-style piece on Bukhara's 2500-year history," and he asked the minister to fax a letter of support.



Felix Golubev in India.

"Had he known the subject was about Jews he would not have been so supportive."

Travelling to the Uzbekistan Embassy in Washington, Golubev said he used the minister's letter to get visas for the crew, then made contact with a local customs manager and maintained contact by phone for months. By the time the crew arrived, the customs officers didn't even bother to check the crew's papers, he said.

By the eighth day, the Bukharan authorities discovered that the crew was shooting in Makhala, the city's Jewish quarter, and an official threatened to confiscate the video tapes, Golubev said.

"After this meeting I called the crew and said, 'You have 15 minutes to pack up and get out of town.' We just threw things into our bus and we hit the road."

Golubev had many hair-raising stories to tell about the lawless Pakistan frontier near the Afghan border, an area ruled by tribes rather government.

He compared the lawlessness of the region to that of the American wild west: everyone carried a gun, but instead of cowhide pants the men wore long black robes.

"We travelled with armed guards. You go to the tribal authorities to get permission to travel. If they agree, they give you armed guards to escort you. We had five or six guys from the ruling tribe with Kalashnikovs [Soviet guns]… We didn't know what to expect."

Golubev said dealing with the unexpected is what makes working on documentaries so exciting. "You never know what's coming next."

In July, he'll be travelling to the islands in northern Russia where Joseph Stalin once had his gulag prison camps, to do preproduction for a film about whales. One camp is now a research station for beluga whales, he said.

Film News I: The award-winning Canadian film The Red Violin is being screened June 1 at New York's Lincoln Centre. The film's American premiere is helping to raise funds to purchase quality violins for use by members of the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra who are recent immigrants to Israel, were unable to bring their instruments with them and cannot afford to purchase new ones.

"Welcoming emigre musicians to its ranks is an important part of the Orchestra's mission," says Itzhak Perlman, co-chair of the American Friends of the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra.

"After all, the Orchestra was founded in 1936 by the renowned violinist Bronislaw Huberman and was originally composed of first rate musicians from throughout Europe who were fleeing the Nazis." 212-697-2949.

Film News II: Clarence Square Pictures Inc., a Toronto-based film production company, has optioned the film rights to Anne Michaels' internationally acclaimed novel, Fugitive Pieces.

"We intend to make a significant, moving film for an international audience on a scale that will do justice to the extraordinary scope of the novel," said Jeffrey Berman, Clarence Square's vice-president.

"We received many offers for the film rights," said Michaels. "Both M&S and I were impressed by Clarence Square's integrity of vision and their commitment to preserving the spirit of the book."

The scenario might sound familiar to those who follow the local book trade. What previous best-selling novel written by a Toronto author went on to become a movie – winning an Academy Award for best picture? Answer: Michael Ondaatje's The English Patient.

Patinkin impeccable and putting on reading glasses with his right.

The new album promises to be most charming, with an exceptional medley of the parallel songs sung by the Scarecrow, the Tin Man and the Cowardly Lion in The Wizard of Oz lamenting their lack of a brain, a heart and "the nerve" respectively.

Patinkin also closed with a Wizard of Oz number, Somewhere Over the Rainbow, in Yiddish. But the real finale came in the lobby, when Patinkin personally collected donations for Doctors Without Borders and LOVE (Leave Out ViolencE), a Montreal-based organization dedicated to combating on-screen violence and working with affected teens.

In the wake of the crisis in Kosovo and recent high school shootings, Patinkin and his wife, actress-writer Kathryn Grody, came up with the fund-raising idea to give Patinkin "a reason to sing."

Kid favorites Judy and David to play Ford Centre

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Nine years ago, David heard a demo tape of a female vocalist named Judy. "I just fell instantly in love. I heard the music and I had to meet the woman," he told The CJN. "It was clear that she had this great soul, and I was completely smitten."

He said things got even better once the two met over lunch, and "we continued to fall madly in love," he said.

Indeed, they got hitched romantically and professionally. Today, Judy and David, a husband and wife musical duo are among Canada's best-known children's entertainers.

They have released six albums, and their latest one, Livin' In a Shoe, won the 1998 Juno Award for best children's recording. Beginning in the fall of 1999, they will be seen daily coast to coast on their own television show, Judy and David's Boom Box.

The duo will be making its first appearance at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts in North York on May 30 at 4 p.m. Their gala concert with the All Together Now Band is a fund raiser for the ELI Society for Child Protection in Israel.

"It's finally all coming together," David said. "It's an incredibly busy and exciting time in our career...The Juno was a real vote of confidence for what we were trying to do."

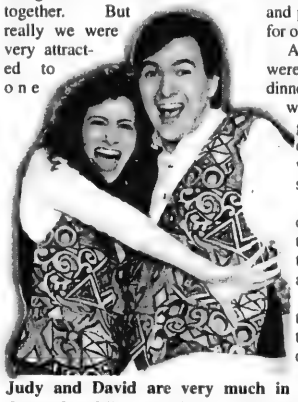
He said his interest in singing and performing children's music dates back to his summer camp days when he was a song leader, at a Reform camp. "Jewish music is what got me into the whole field of music." At one point in his life he had even considered becoming a rabbi, he said.

When he met Judy, she was teaching instrumental music in the public school system. "Music has been part of my life for as long as I can remember," she said. "I was the youngest of three girls, and both my sisters took piano lessons. I couldn't wait until I was old enough to take piano.

"I always sang as a kid. I participated in musicals at summer camps. When I was in high school, I studied classical voice training at the conservatory."

She majored in piano performance at the University of Toronto, but she also plays cello, flute and guitar. She eventually got a teacher's certificate in instrumental music.

Like her husband, Judy had also been a song leader at various summer camps. She had heard about David through mutual friends before they actually met. Before their first lunch date she had already been "toying with the idea" of performing children's music, she said. "We got together on the pretence of doing children' s music together. But really we were very attracted to one another."



Judy and David are very much in demand and "can get the whole place singing."

At the time, David was going to different synagogues to lead family group sing-along evenings, and within two month of dating, Judy became part of the act, she said. "Originally, we called ourselves David and Judy. By the time our act was established, we became Judy and David."

And while they now sing in large concert halls across the country, they still like to go back to their musical roots – a mixture of children's and Jewish music – and give concerts at synagogues, David said.

In the duo's early years, they both kept their day jobs while they performed at a series of venues. Judy taught while David had a variety of jobs in the entertainment industry which included raising money for corporate underwriting, and putting together opportunities for other creative acts.

As performers, Judy and David were very much in demand for dinners and functions, because they were very skilled in getting groups of people to sing, David explained. "We would get the whole place singing. That was such a joy.

"That's why we went into children's music, because there's an unspoken agreement to let your guard down and sing a little...in our case a lot."

In 1992, David left his job to start Altogether Now Entertainment, the couple's company. "The name is no accident," he said. "That's what we're all about. Judy kept teaching and paid the bills while I worked very hard to launch us as an act... We decided that if we were going to do this, we would go all the way."

That year, they released a demo tape called Jumping Up and Down, which led to – Little Yellow School Bus and My Little Red Firetruck, tapes they made for a flat fee that were marketed with toys – a schoolbus and a firetruck, respectively– and sold door-to-door.

"We did the project on a shoestring," David said. "We played all the instruments ourselves. We used friends, whoever happened to come by."

More than five million copies of those albums were sold worldwide, significantly increasing the couple's exposure, David said.

In 1996, Judy and David developed a television special for the Family Channel and they gradually began doing guest spots on other children's television series.

Livin' in a Shoe, the couple's first real studio album netted them the 1998 Juno Award, but negotiations with YPT for their daily four-minute television show were already in process, David said. They showed a lot of faith in us long before the Juno. I'm sure the Juno didn't hurt."

All the songs on that last album are original material, he said. "We discovered we're a good writing team. But it certainly had its growing pains."

Looking back over the last nine years, there was "no single turning point" in their musical career, but rather "a series of milestones," David said. "You work hard. You keep on singing and you try to enjoy yourself."

BEAUTY SHOP

By Carol Wise

A myriad of colors adorn the summer palette. It seems nursery blue and bubble gum pink are the darlings of the season. But don't get carried away folks. They are not quite screaming the '80s; the colors are much more translucent.

Cosmetic companies seem to be bent on words like – "all day," "forever" and "long wearing." What a phenomenon: makeup that doesn't come off. Clearly this is the season to take advantage – lips, eyes, foundation, it all works. Looking fresh at the end of a long, hot, humid day is a welcome possibility, as I'm sure you would agree.

Protect you skin from the sun every day. Most sunscreens take about 30 minutes to become effective, so make application part of your morning routine. Without a shadow of a doubt, Ombrelle covers the gamut of sunscreen requirements. It is non-greasy and even spreads evenly on your scalp. Remember, reflected UV rays are just as dangerous as direct rays. White sand reflects 25 percent, water reflects up to 100 percent.

Some great advancements have been made in the area of self-tanning cremes. You will find that color staining is more natural and a lot less orange. Try Lancome's Flash Bronzer gel for both face and legs and achieve that sun-kissed look without damage.

CAROL'S TIPS

SKIN CARE: Put your rich cremes away for the summer. The added humidity will provide you with extra hydration. Lotions and gels are perfect for this time of the year. Vitaminize your skin with Chanel's Hydra-Serum Visage and Hydra-Serum Corps. These cocktails have a concentrated complex of vitamins B, E and F to help prevent loss of moisture – a great after sun drink.

Check out Biotherm's Hydra-Detox Yeux, a moisturizing eye gel – totally refreshing. While you're at the counter, take a look at Chanel's eye care system; it is fascinating.

Lancaster introduces Skin Maximizer, a line of seven skin care products based on a technological breakthrough that help stimulate microcirculation on the surface of the skin. The principle is to stimulate the skin's energy potential and provide advanced protection from the environment. These velvety soft cremes feel incredible and do create a certain radiance.

FOUNDATION: Keep it sheer and translucent. Apply it sparingly and when you go to the beach, forget it and use a bronzer. Use a thicker formula to cover discolored or blemished areas. Derma Blend is a good choice. L'Oreal has created Quick Stick Longwearing Makeup. It's fast, effective and fabulous for touch ups. Clinique has developed an oil-absorbing, lightweight, long-wearing makeup, named Superfit. This makeup appears fresh all day, no matter how much oil, perspiration and humidity it is up against. Lancaster's Light Enhancing Matte Finish Foundation is designed for lovers of the "natural look." It provides a transparent veil of color with medium coverage and a matte finish.

L'Oreal's On-the-loose shimmering powder [top] is so much fun. Lancaster's skin maximizer provides long-lasting radiance.

EYES: Color is everything this summer. Try L'Oreal's On-the-loose shimmering powder, it's so much fun! For extra definition, try Lancaster's eye enhancing pencil; the texture is perfect, not too soft, not too hard. Christian Dior treats us with Multi-Touch, a monochrome makeup that is all about doing everything with one color – eyes, lips and cheeks. This little mini-compact is just great and the best is, you can apply it with your fingertips. Paint your nails with matching polish for the total look.

LIPS: Define your lips with a colored pencil. Most popular shades this season are fruity. Always top up with shiny gloss. Try Dior's Rouge Sirop directly on bare lips or over your favorite color. This is a limited edition, so don't miss it.

Take a look at Flin Flan from Cargo – absolutely fabulous! – guaranteed to make your lips luscious. Chanel has created sheer liquid color in five ultra-shiny shades – a must this summer. Lancome makes another discovery called Rough Magnetic, a weightless lip color that feels satiny. And guess what – it stays on all day.

NAILS: Nail specialists from L'Oreal offer five easy to use products to help make your nails healthy and look great. Chanel's new glaze, quick dry, is fun makeup for your fingertips. Transparent color leaves your nails looking like stained glass.

HAIR: "Soft, silky and long describe the look for summer" says Daniel Fiorio, proprietor of Salon Daniel (25 Bellair). "Hair extensions, (Gwenyth Paltrow – Shakespeare in Love) are the buzz among the fashion cognoscenti. If you don't have natural length or volume, this unique technique might be for you. Long hair, bare shoulders suggest Summer in the City," jests the stylish designer.

How great is this! Think about it. If you want long hair, it's yours in just a few hours.

Try L'Oreal's new hair spray, it is light and protects your hair's natural lustre.

FRAGRANCE: Smell delicious with your favorite guy. Get Together, two new fragrances from Giorgio Armani, one for men and one for woman, are quite individual, yet provocatively intertwined. Clinique's Happy is a lightly fragranced hydrating spray that scents the body with hints of citrus and exotic flowers. O'Oui bath and body collection from Lancome smells just like fruit sherbet, so good you can almost taste it. Bill Blass opens the door to a new fragrance – Amazing – and you know what, it is absolutely amazing! It is feminine, sensual and totally seductive.

Summer Fashion

ANIMAL PRINTS ARE IN

Everybody loves the bright, colorful clothing that matches the sunny summer weather. And if the fabric breathes and the style is cool and appealing, you are bound to wear the outfit for work and strolls through this season. Animal prints from the Olsen Collection continue to be a strong draw. In t-shirts, tops, skirts and twin sets, animal prints are making a splash in whimsical patterns and sophisticated motifs. Here the exotic appeal is highlighted in a palette of natural colors and earth tones like olive, muted browns and creamy neutrals.

Shawn Green emerges as a Major League star

By MORDECAI SPECKTOR
The American Jewish World

Toronto Blue Jays slugger Shawn Green signed autographs for eager students last week at Associated Hebrew Day Schools' Kamin campus in Thornhill. Green also addressed students on the importance of respect. He was invited by Associated grade 5 student Jared Garshowitz. [Ron Csillag photo]

MINNEAPOLIS — It's spring at the Hubert H. Humphrey Metrodome in downtown Minneapolis and the aroma of pine tar is in the air.

The Toronto Blue Jays are in town for the opening series of the 1999 baseball season against the Minnesota Twins, and coming down the stairs from the visitors' clubhouse is Shawn Green, an emerging star at the plate and roaming right fielder for the Jays.

Last year, the 6-foot-4 California native put up some impressive numbers: 35 home runs, 100 RBIs, 106 runs, 175 hits, a .278 average and 35 stolen bases. He's off to a strong start in 1999. By May 12, Green had tallied 11 home runs (tops on the team), 35 RBIs, 26 runs, 44 hits and a .306 batting average.

Many baseball mavens believe Green has the ability to emerge over the long haul as the most potent Jewish slugger since Hank Greenberg swung a bat.

"Last year was a real good season," comments Green, standing in front of the Blue Jays dugout as the Twins finish their turn in the batting cage. "It's a lot of fun to be one of the main parts of a good team, and, hopefully we'll get to the playoffs and the World Series."

Green, who finally got to play on a regular basis last year, became the first player in Jays' history – and just the ninth American Leaguer – to join the 30/30 club. His 35 homers and 35 steals point to a rare combination of power hitting and finesse on the base paths.

"It's something I didn't really think about that much until it started getting into the realm of possibility," Green allows. "Once that happened it definitely was a goal of mine to reach that milestone."

The personable ballplayer gives credit for his base stealing prowess to Maury Wills, the former L.A. Dodgers speedster who is a spring training instructor for Toronto.

"He's been great; he's taught me a lot," Green says. "He helped me with my stolen bases a great deal... He really encourages us to keep running and keep going. It's good to have a guy like that on our side."

In assessing his remarkable offensive production last year – Toronto baseball writers named him Most Improved Player for the Blue Jays – Green comments, "I'm always training hard and trying new things. Just learning from the veteran players that I get to play with, like [former Blue Jays slugger Jose] Canseco, [third baseman] Tony Fernandez and Paul Molitor, you try to learn as much as you can from them and that helps you improve your own game."

Green's respect for the veterans is reciprocated.

As the Blue Jays go through their pre-game stretches, Molitor – who played with the Blue Jays from 1993-1995 before returning home to play with the Twins – recalls how Green came to the club with a "lot of hype. He was a young player with a lot of skills: power, speed, a good defensive outfielder, a strong throwing arm."

Molitor, who recently retired and now works some games in the TV broadcast booth for the Twins, continues: "Getting to know him on a personal level, I knew he had the type of makeup to complement that ability. It was just a matter of time before he could blossom. Last year, we got a taste of what's in store for Jays fans and Shawn Green fans. He has a chance to be one of the dominant players in the American League."

Reviewing Green's accomplishments in 1998, Molitor concludes that the talented Jays star is the type of player "you build your club around... Personally and professionally, I think he's going to do a lot of great things in baseball. With his attitude and his approach to the game, he's going to have a positive effect off the field as well."

Leaning against the batting cage, Blue Jays manager Jim Fregosi echoes Molitor's assessment of the 26-year-old ballplayer's all-round skills: "He does everything you could ever ask out of a guy. He's got a great future and he'll play for a long time... I think that as his career goes on, he'll become a much better player."

Toronto baseball scribes say Green has become a big favorite of hometown fans – and he has his Jewish fan-base in mind.

"The Jewish community in Toronto's been great. They have a large and supportive Jewish community there, big sports fans, so it's nice to be a member of that community," says Green. "I'd like to try to do more for the community. As far as charity work, it's been hard the first few years. I'm just trying to get settled in, but now I'd like to do some things to help out there... They definitely have been reaching out to me, so it's a good feeling."

In a recent development, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto announced that Green would appear in a video for the second year of the Campaign for Fifty, which aims to raise $50 million annually by 2001.

"No other Jewish organization is doing so much to help the vulnerable, bring Jews closer to their roots and rescue them from dangerous situations around the world," Green said in a UJA Federation news release.

"We're extremely excited that Shawn has joined us," said campaign vice-chair Howard Price. "His ability, modesty and identification with UJA Federation makes him a role model for thousands."

Players in the Big Show

MINNEAPOLIS — Who's Jewish in Major League Baseball in 1999?

Some 150 Jews have sojourned in the big leagues – from Nate Berkenstock, who played one game in 1871, to Hall of Fame pitcher Sandy Koufax.

In addition to Shawn Green, there are now five Jews on active big league rosters. (Jesse Levis, who was a catcher for the Milwaukee Brewers last year, was cut by the Tampa Bay Devil Rays, but is in their extended spring training program recuperating from an arm injury. Gabe Kapler, a promising outfielder for the Detroit Tigers, was on the team's opening day roster, but was recently sent to Toledo, their AAA farm team.)

The following players are plying their trade in the Big Show:

- Brad Ausmus, catcher, Detroit Tigers;
- Al Levine and Scott Schoeneweis, relief pitchers, Anaheim Angels;
- Mike Lieberthal, catcher, Philadelphia Phillies;
- Scott Radinsky, relief pitcher, St. Louis Cardinals.

And let's not forget Al Clark, Major Leagie Baseball's Jewish umpire.

ספרותנו

מאת: יעל זליגר

ספרים פשוטים ונושאים לא פשוטים

About Food

Dear Norene

Oy, the joy of soy! The media touts the benefits of soy daily. We constantly seek magical foods that will give us good health and eternal life!

The best approach is to eat more fruits, vegetables and grains. These plant foods contain phytochemicals, substances that act as antioxidants and much more. Soy foods, including tofu, are integral to plant-centred cuisine.

The Phytopia Cookbook by Barbara Gollman and Kim Pierce (1-888-750-9336) is an excellent resource to help you include more tofu in your diet. Although not a kosher cookbook, it's packed with recipes that can be easily adapted for the kosher kitchen. It focuses on flavor, sneaks nutrition onto the plate, and explains the science behind the recipes.

The authors emphasize the benefits of a plant-centred cuisine, yet still include meat, which so many of us enjoy. They do terrific things with tofu, like caesar salad, cranberry-almond muffins, leek & mushroom manicotti, even brownies! Now you can pat yourself on the back for eating chocolate. You'll never taste the tofu!

Toasted Almond Brownies

light extra-firm silken tofu (or regular block tofu), blended cocoa (Dutch-processed or regular)
1/4 cups water
2 tbsp. canola oil
1 1/2 cups sugar
1 tsp. vanilla extract
1 egg + 2 egg whites
1 cup unbleached flour
1/4 tsp. salt
3 tbsp. chopped or sliced almonds

Preheat oven to 350 F. In processor, mix cocoa, water and oil. Add blended tofu, sugar, vanilla and eggs, mix well; blend in flour and salt. Do not overprocess.

Pour into sprayed 8-in. pan, sprinkle with almonds and bake 30 minutes. Top will be shiny, but firm. Makes 9 brownies.

265 calories per brownie, 6.1 g fat (0.8 g sat. fat), 5.39 mg sodium, 24 mg cholesterol, 2 g fibre, 40 mg calcium, 48 g carbs, 6 g protein.

Blended tofu: Whip tofu in processor or blender until consistency of mayonnaise. Be patient, it takes several minutes. Store covered in refrigerator up to one week.

Norene's Tofu Smoothie: Use leftover tofu to make a yummy, dairy-free smoothie!

Combine 1 cup tofu, 1 cut-up banana, 2 cups cut-up frozen fruit (e.g. strawberries, melon), 1/2 cup orange juice, 1 tsp. honey, 1 tsp. vanilla. Blend until smooth.

Makes 3 cups. Note: soy or regular milk can be substituted.

WE CAN'T DO IT WITHOUT YOU!

UJA FEDERATION
UNITED JEWISH APPEAL • JEWISH FEDERATION OF GREATER TORONTO

I have always believed that voluntarism is an essential expression of "tzedakah."

As my term as President of UJA Federation draws to a close, I am now more fully able to appreciate how generous our community truly is.

Over the past two years, I have witnessed members of our Jewish community from all walks of life step up to take responsibility, to lend a hand, offering their time, wisdom and compassion in order to support individuals in need and to help continue building our community services.

Your commitment to our agencies, schools, synagogues and organizations, manifested through your outstanding volunteer service, stands as a legacy that we are continually challenged to emulate.

I am grateful to each and every one of you for what you have accomplished – and for what, together, we will accomplish in the future.

We Can't Do It Without You!

by Helen Finder-Guttman
Vice-Chair, Human Resources
UJA Federation

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is delighted once again to recognize volunteers from the many diverse organizations and agencies within our community.

The not-for-profit sector has been undergoing a radical change for the past several years. The impact of shrinking financial resources continues to be felt in all areas of service delivery. As programs and services are pared down, the lives of a significant number of people are seriously affected. More than ever, we need to recognize and support the work of volunteers who, at all levels, struggle to sustain and redefine our services as we move into the next century.

The men and women pictured in these pages represent only a small number of the dedicated individuals who give so freely of their time and talents to help keep our community strong and viable.

And so – to these dedicated volunteers, we say "Thank You."
Thank you for your leadership and your compassion.
Thank you for your unwavering commitment. As a community, we take pride in your accomplishments and your sense of tzedakah.

"We Can't Do It Without You!"

VOLUNTEERS– PILLARS OF THE COMMUNITY

by Rob Sandler

In thinking about voluntarism and the true spirit of "giving," it is interesting how the most wonderful role models can be found along the entire spectrum of human need – from the organizers of the UJA Federation Walk for Israel, to the delivery person for Meals on Wheels, to those who flew to Trenton to help welcome the refugees from Kosovo. It is written in the Mishnah Sanhedrin 4:5, "Whoever saves a single life, it is as if he saved an entire world." It is in these many "saved worlds" that one can find examples of the core of voluntarism.

A human life is not only saved from death. It is also saved from loneliness. From oppression. From hunger. From loss of direction and uprootedness. These "saved worlds" can be seen on the directory at the Lipa Green Building, showing the work that is being done on an organizational level to ensure continuity, education, funding and the highest caliber of programming for the Toronto Jewish community and in Israel. They can be seen in the eyes of the recipients of the plethora of programs that assist those who are unable to help themselves – the Jewish elderly living in poverty, the special children of Reena, the new immigrants who are looking to build roots in a new country and in a new Jewish community. It is the unsaid calling of the volunteers to assist causes and persons in need that make their contributions so much more meaningful. Maimonides considers the highest form of tzedakah "where a person assists his fellow so as to allow them to help themselves." It is often in this mindset that volunteers give tirelessly of their time, energy, enthusiasm and inspiration.

The sense of communal responsibility and connectivity penetrates every aspect of Jewish life, from tzedakah to voluntarism to the way we pray as Jews. Rabbi Joseph Telushkin points out that almost all Jewish prayers are offered not in the singular but in the plural. "Only when people address G-d in the plural," says Telushkin, "are they likely to pray for that which is universally beneficial." It is this universal responsibility – to the needy, to the new immigrants, to the communities of tomorrow, and to those like the persecuted of Kosovo that need help to see tomorrow – that makes the volunteer a pillar of the community.

Rob Sandler is a participant of the Wexner Heritage Foundation Leadership Program, and a graduate of UJA Federation's Leadership Development Program.

CHAT Ahead of Its Time in Volunteer Service

Long before the Ontario Ministry of Education institutes a community involvement program for high schools this fall, the students at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) were already making their mark.

Over three years ago, CHAT introduced its Community Service Program, which currently requires grades 9, 10 and 11 students to perform 18 hours of community service per year. The school's Community Service Board posts volunteer opportunities that include over 175 Jewish and non-Jewish charities and organizations. The only stipulation is that they perform the work without monetary gain on any day except Shabbat or Jewish holidays. The community service component is assessed on student report cards.

This year over 700 kids will perform 13,000 community service hours, increasing to 1100 kids by next school year, and 20,000 hours.

"The students by and large are very responsible about it," says Coordinator of Student Activities, Gary Levine. "They are wonderful representatives of the school and the community has been very appreciative."

"The project gives us responsibility and encourages us to volunteer more," says grade 9 student, Zoe Bercovici. "Once we do it, we realize how rewarding it is."

The concept of student volunteerism helps educators tie in the core Jewish value of helping others gemilut hasadim. "I'm proud that I have this opportunity to give something back," adds Bercovici.

CHAT is a member of the UJA Federation family of Jewish schools.

Jewish Community Welcomes Corporate Volunteers

Non-profit organizations, such as UJA Federation, are enthusiastic about a new approach to voluntarism involving corporate representatives serving as volunteers at community agencies. Plans are now being drawn up to create a mechanism that will match corporate volunteers with appropriate volunteer opportunities throughout the organized Jewish community. Through its Corporate Partners program, UJA Federation will be exploring group and individual volunteer opportunities – perhaps on a project-by-project basis. The initiative is being spearheaded by JAVA, the Jewish Association of Volunteer Administration.

"The establishment of a Corporate Volunteer Program is one of many positive examples of resource and idea sharing among agency volunteer administrators, brought together by UJA Federation," says JAVA member Arlene Margolese, manager of Volunteer Services & Judaic programming at Reena.

In Toronto, corporate voluntarism remains an untapped source of volunteer support, although it has been on the agenda of American non-profits for several years, with rewarding results.

According to the Canadian Centre for Philanthropy, corporate volunteer programs can "help alleviate job stress and low morale, contribute to employee physical and mental well being, reduce sick days and encourage networking for career transition purposes."

Parties express support for public funding

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In a series of letters to leaders in the Jewish community, the Ontario Progressive Conservative party has promised to discuss providing non-educational services, such as health support, to children attending independent religious schools.

The promise by the Conservatives is very similar to that expressed in the election by both the Liberals and the New Democratic Party.

Ontario Premier Mike Harris expressed this willingness in a May 20 letter to Keith Landy, Ontario chair of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), while Finance Minister Ernie Eves made a similar statement in a letter addressed to community volunteer Larry Tanenbaum and to B'nai Brith executive vice-president Frank Dimant. Harris signed the letter, "leader, P.C. party of Ontario."

The Harris letter came two days after a televised leaders' debate in which the premier rejected suggestions the province would fund independent Jewish schools – but in which he did not mention funding non-educational health services.

At the time, Landy said Congress was concerned that Harris did not reaffirm his earlier position on health support services for children with special needs.

But by last week, Landy was viewing the premier's letter as "encouraging. We see this as a commitment to follow through on what he said verbally to us, that non-educational funds are available to all students."

In his letter, Harris said, "I am willing to discuss providing non-education services currently provided to the public education system, to independent schools. Health services are one such example. I believe we should be working toward providing all children in Ontario independent schools with the non-education services that we currently provide in the public system.

"I am prepared to have my ministers sit down with the CJC and other concerned parties on ways to make this happen."

Eves' letter was written in similar language and came shortly after a meeting involving himself, St. Paul's Tory candidate Isabel Bassett, outgoing Attorney-General

The News in Brief

CANADA

CJC Endows Course

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) last week announced the endowment of a course in Holocaust studies at York University. A donation of $60,000 to York was made possible by a fund set up by CJC following the 1985 gathering in Ottawa of thousands of Holocaust survivors and their children. As part of the agreement, York will allocate funds to support a course in Holocaust studies that will examine the Jewish experience before, during and after World War II. The course will be open to all qualified York students and will be offered through the university's Centre for Jewish Studies.

Intervention Sought

OTTAWA — The president of the Association of Romanian Jewish Survivors of the Holocaust (ARJSH), together with CJC, has appealed to two international bodies for assistance on outstanding war-era issues. Issie Veisfeld has written the UN's High Commissioner for Human Rights and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe. Last year, Veisfeld presented a four-point plan of action to the visiting president of Romania, Emil Constantinescu. The plans called for memorials at common graves, implementing education programs, acknowledging the role played by Romanian fascists, and instituting restitution. The joint ARJSH-CJC brief has also been submitted to Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy.

ISRAEL

Haredim Detained

JERUSALEM — Israeli police last week detained four haredim who tried to disrupt a mixed prayer service that some 200 members of the Conservative movement held at the Western Wall.

Fires Rage On

JERUSALEM — Firefighters are combating blazes across Israel that are being blamed on a heat wave. More than 60 fires have erupted there this week, including two in the Arab village of Sakhnin that destroyed some 25 acres of woodlands.

WORLD

Finnish Jews Concerned

HELSINKI — Finnish Jews are concerned about government-subsidized plans to commemorate Finns who fought alongside the Nazi SS during World War II. The government money would help build a monument at a site in Ukraine, where some 150 Finnish SS members were killed. A government official recently defended the plans, saying there is no evidence that Finish SS members were involved in wartime atrocities.

Evidence Uncovered

BUENOS AIRES — A government panel in Argentina recently uncovered evidence that the nation's central bank served as a repository for Nazi gold after Adolf Hitler's fall. In recent weeks, Argentine researchers found three letters from the 1950s, including one implicating the Swiss central bank. Researchers say the letters prove Argentina served as a hub for laundering Nazi-looted gold.

Convicted of Mass Murder

BERLIN — A 79-year-old former Gestapo agent was convicted last month in a German court on charges of helping murder 17,000 people, most of them Jews, at the Majdanek concentration camp in Poland. The court sentenced Alfons Goetzfrid to 10 years in prison, bringing to a close what could be the last major war crimes trial in Germany. Goetzfrid will not serve time in a German jail because of the 13 years he had already spent in Soviet prison camps.

100 More Kosovars Arrive from Macedonia

JERUSALEM — A second group of 100 Kosovar refugees arrived here last week from Macedonia.

The group, which arrived May 26 on a plane chartered by the Jewish Agency for Israel, includes members of some 19 families, as well as relatives of refugees who arrived in Israel in April.

Among the arrivals was Arta Cucci, a 23-year-old medical student who was reunited with her parents and two siblings at the airport.

"This is the happiest moment of my life, I will never forget this moment," she told reporters.

In his first public appearance since his election defeat, defeated Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was among the Israeli officials at Ben-Gurion Airport receiving the newcomers.

The Jewish Agency brought the refugees to Israel on the return leg of a flight that had delivered eight tons of food, medical supplies and clothes to Macedonia.

Apart from the latest flight, the Jewish Agency has sent 10 flights to refugee camps in Macedonia and Albania with more than 120 tons of aid.

Most of the refugees are to be housed at Kibbutz Ma'agan Michael, in northern Israel, where April's group is housed. Others will be taken to Kibbutz Kramim, near Beersheba in southern Israel.

The refugees are being given the status of tourists, and their stay will be coordinated by the agency and the Ministry of Absorption.

CRTC rules out regulating the Internet

Decision draws mixed reviews from Jewish organizations

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Internet may not be sacrosanct when it comes to complying with Canadian law on hate promotion, but neither will the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission (CRTC) regulate the rapidly growing communications medium.

In a widely anticipated announcement recently, the CRTC rejected suggestions it regulate the Internet, the world-wide computer network.

"Our message is clear. We are not regulating any portion of the Internet," said CRTC chair François Bertrand. "The CRTC is concerned that any attempt to regulate Canadian new media might put the industry at a competitive disadvantage in the global marketplace.

"We believe...that appropriate tools already exist to deal with offensive and illegal content. Tools such as Canadian laws of general application, industry self-regulation, content filtering software as well as increased media awareness," Bertrand stated.

The CRTC announcement drew mixed reviews in the Jewish community. The Simon Wiesenthal Centre (SWC) and B'nai Brith Canada stated they believed the Internet should be regulated while Canadian Jewish Congress was satisfied that law enforcement agencies could employ other tools to control the promotion of hate in the new medium.

"We're not in disagreement per se with the CRTC decision," said Mark Weintraub, national chair of community relations for Congress. "We had articulated our concerns in a brief to the [Commission] and our primary concern was that the regulation of hate not fall through the jurisdictional cracks.

"Our focus is not on which body is ultimately responsible, but to ensure that confusion did not reign...We are of the view there is an arsenal that could be used," including the Criminal Code provision against the promotion of hate and the Canadian Human Rights Act (CHRA), which prohibits use of telephone and other media to disseminate hate.

(A Canadian Human Rights Commission tribunal is currently hearing a case involving a Web site purportedly operated by Holocaust-denier Ernst Zundel. The Commission alleges the site – known as "Zundelsite" – promotes hatred of Jews. Congress, B'nai Brith and the Simon Wiesenthal Centre (SWC) are interveners in the case. Zundel has challenged the jurisdiction of the tribunal, arguing the Internet was not a telephonic form of communication that came within the CHRA's jurisdiction. Although the tribunal ruled against him, Zundel can be expected to appeal that decision.)

B'nai Brith spokesman Frank Dimant said "the CRTC has it half right...The Internet should be regulated, but not by them. The Canadian Human Rights Commission is the body with the mandate and the expertise to deal with hate propaganda transmitted over telephone wires. They should have the clear mandate to deal with hate on the Internet."

Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the SWC, took a tougher line. "I think the CRTC lost a golden opportunity to bring some sanity and order to the Internet," he said.

"The Internet at the present time has become the haven for hatemongers, pornographers, swindlers and nags. For the past three years, the centre has been closely monitoring hate groups."

A few years ago, there were "no more than 50 sites worldwide worthy of our attention. At the present time, there are 1,833 such sites."

Littman acknowledged that Canada is largely free of hate sites but he argued the CRTC should have addressed several issues, including the liability of foreign Internet Service Providers (ISPs) that host hate messages that are acted upon in Canada. Gun manufacturers and cigarette companies are facing lawsuits in the United States resulting from their products, he pointed out.

The CRTC also should have examined the feasibility of cross-border protests to U.S. authorities concerning hate sites as well as legal remedies against ISPs that refuse to remove racist Web sites.

Littman said Canadian ISPs generally co-operate to remove offensive sites once they are brought to

Tragedy Has Struck

An extraordinary woman in our community—a 50 year old, single mother of 10 children, has tragically passed away after a serious illness.

Her modest salary as a secretary for one of our local Jewish Day Schools, allowed her to barely cover the basic family expenses, let alone the cost of expensive medical treatment and nursing care.

The children have been left with about $200k in debts and no further means of financial support. Funds are required for basic necessities such as food, clothing, housing and Jewish education.

The family desperately wants to stay together, with the older children taking on the responsibility of raising and ultimately marrying off the younger ones and themselves.

We appeal to you to support our community's efforts to establish a trust fund for these children. All cheques over $10 will receive charitable tax receipts. In the spirit of Jewish compassion and generosity at this holiday time, please open your hearts and donate generously. Thank you.

Unpleasant resonance

Two weeks ago in this column, I expressed the opinion that all society is damaged by the use of "attack ads" in television and radio advertisements run by political parties during their campaigns to win re-election. I lamented that the cynicism such campaigning evokes among the electorate, and in particular among the young electorate, eventually "impoverishes us all."

"[The cynicism] robs us and our society of the notion that public service is a noble service," I wrote.

But it is not the attack ads alone that contribute to voter cynicism. The attack ads are but one example of the behavior spawned by an electioneering ethos of "mean and nasty."

The Ontario leaders debate two weeks ago, as indeed are most leaders debates in most elections, was another example of the triumphalism of "mean and nasty."

The rudest behavior is considered the most reliable evidence of assertiveness, confidence and strength of character. In fact, however, it should only be considered reliable evidence of a bullying character and thus precisely the very opposite of the qualities we seek in a leader - irrespective of political stripe – whose public example we would be proud to have our children emulate.

Much like the "attack ads," the contumelious bickering exhibited by the leaders during their so-called debate, also contributes to the high level of voter cynicism.

But quite apart from voter dissonance created by the generally querulous comportment of the three candidates during the debate, there was one moment in the debate that was particularly bothersome.

It occurred when Premier Mike Harris was asked by one of the reporters to comment on the privatization of the education system, on charter schools and on the use of vouchers.

The premier responded: "I've been asked if I would support private schools. I went to the Jewish Congress. I said, 'No. I'm sorry. My priority is public education.' "

He then immediately challenged Dalton McGuinty on the record, as it were, before the cameras, to also tell the "Jewish Congress" that he does not support private schools.

Wayne Levin, an organizer with Parents for Educational Choice, a grassroots lobby group trying to achieve public funding for the general education portion of the private school curriculum, aptly characterized the sting in the premier's remarks: "The fact that the premier made it a Jewish issue and aimed the spotlight at us is disturbing."

To its credit, the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) reacted immediately to the premier's inappropriate debating parry.

Keith Landy, chair of the CJC Ontario region told The CJN "We're uncomfortable with leaders of political parties in the heat of a political debate using throwaway lines to score points on an issue that's so important to our community."

The premier's decision to use his essentially private conversations during a February visit with the "Jewish Congress" as a "debating" tactic was shocking.

It was a cheap, theatrical ploy intended, as Landy observed, "to score points."

Unfortunately however, the impact of the premier's incontinent remark went far beyond the enclosed, harmless realm of theatre.

His remark, presumably telecast into many thousands of Ontario households, singled out the Jewish community for public derision, if not scorn.

In doing so, the premier suggested that the matter of public funding was a "Jewish" issue. But of course this is wholly false and incorrect.

The question of public funding is one of fundamental fairness. It affects a number of different groups – Muslims, Sikhs, and Protestants – who have been denied the preference that the law now bestows on Catholics.

Moreover, there are a number of narrower areas within the broader issue of public funding on which the premier has indicated a positive inclination. For example, at that February meeting with Congress, he strongly implied that the province would look favorably on funding non-educational aspects of non-Catholic, private education, such as health and dental services.

But the premier chose merely to simplify the issue without any regard to its wider implications or his own past pronouncements.

More ominously though, by talking only about "the Jewish Congress," the premier left the impression that he was defending the integrity of the public treasury against the unreasonable demands of and possible encroachments by the Jews.

His language conjured up an imagery that evoked in me the unpleasant resonance of cold memories.

Is it any wonder, voters become cynical? MBD

Harris will consider funding school support services

Charles Harnick, Tanenbaum and Dimant.

The meeting, he wrote, "was a good opportunity to confirm our government's desire to work toward providing non-education services provided in the public education system, to independent schools. Health services support for special needs children is one such example. We believe it is important for us to work toward providing all children in Ontario independent schools with the non-education services that we currently provide in the public system."

Harris' letter also confirmed his televised rejection of government funding for educational instruction in independent religious schools.

"Our priority...is to raise standards in public education. While we recognize there are alternatives to our public education system, we have decided to focus our efforts and resources at improving the quality of our public schools," he wrote.

Landy chose not to accept Harris' statement on school funding as the last word.

"I'm ever hopeful that something that is so clearly discrimination has to be addressed. I see this as a temporary setback on the overall funding issue, but a positive step on special needs funding."

B'nai Brith Canada waded into the issue with a news release that called for "equitable funding for all students in Ontario."

"This is clearly an issue of discrimination that does not affect the Jewish community alone," said Lawrence Hart, president of B'nai Brith Canada. "The Christian, Muslim, Hindu and Sikh communities are among the other groups affected by an educational funding policy that is completely out of tune with the multicultural diversity of the province."

Landy suggested the premier left open the provision of other support services, such as textbooks and transportation.

"We take small steps and we see it as a positive," he said.

"We can't forget we're in the middle of an election campaign and in an effort to win the hearts and minds of Jewish parents, the Conservatives are defining the parameters where they're prepared to assist...The proof is in the pudding after an election," Landy said.

Liberal party president Tim Murphy took a more partisan view. "Mr. Eves and Mr. Harris are doing this as damage control from the debate," he asserted. "Our platform has included this right from the beginning."

He pointed to a written statement by McGuinty that confirmed "we feel strongly that every Ontarian deserves universal access to quality health-care services. Every child, regardless of whether he/she attends a private or publicly funded school deserves access to publicly funded health supports such as speech pathologists, occupational therapists and nursing care...A Liberal government would be in favor of extending those services to children in private schools."

New Democratic Party leader Howard Hampton has also gone on record supporting health services, saying "the NDP is committed to funding health support services for all children with special needs and those in independent, religious schools."

Tanenbaum, who co-chaired last year's UJA Federation fundraising campaign, said he considered Eves' letter "a breakthrough. There is no question about it."

He also spoke personally to the Tory finance minister and "the words on the phone and in the meeting are much stronger than those in the letter...This will be done. It's the only right thing to do and the government realizes it," he said.

Tanenbaum, whose financial interests include part ownership of the Toronto Maple Leafs and the Toronto Raptors, said "I would like to see full funding for the secular portion in religious independent schools. I've had a very close association with the ministers through any number of businesses I'm in and the hats that I wear, and I've taken the opportunity to lobby on those issues.

"I don't think they're dead set against it. I think it's a question of timing and priority. The first priority is to fix the public school system and then look at independent schools. I'm convinced of that. They will eventually address funding for independent schools."

Tanenbaum said he could see "no ideological opposition among Tories to funding for independent schools."

Those comments echoed a statement made by Murphy, who said the Liberals "are not ideologically opposed to school funding but our first priority is to get public education fixed."

CRTC won't regulate Internet

management's attention. He commended the Canadian Association of Internet Providers (CAIP), a group that meets to discuss the Internet service industry, in that regard.

"We are very pleased with the [CRTC] decision," said CAIP president Ron Kawchuk. "I think it makes a lot of sense it terms of what the Commission can and cannot do."

CAIP relies on three "pillars" for self-regulation, he continued: providing end-users with a software filter to prevent the browsing of unwanted Web sites; creating public awareness of the issue; and developing a code of conduct for CAIP members.

Kawchuk said the SWC played an important role in the self-regulation process by informing ISPs when they were hosting racist Web sites.

"ISPs do not look at the content, so you have to have someone say, 'we have problems with these sites, and here's why'," Kawchuk said.

Littman acknowledged that Canadian ISPs generally co-operate in removing racist Web content. He pointed to a recent situation involving CadVision, a Calgary-based ISP that quietly removed a "white nationalist" Web site after the SWC had brought it to management's attention last January.

Canada accepting fewer 'refugee' claims from Israel

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada is still accepting refugees from Israel, although in much lower numbers than in previous years.

Last year, Ottawa accepted just 24 refugee claimants from Israel, and rejected 625, based on 995 cases finalized. The rest were either abandoned or withdrawn. A further 387 cases are pending.

The acceptance rate was down dramatically for the fourth consecutive year and is the lowest since 1990.

The continuing drop seems to show that Jerusalem's repeated pleas to Ottawa that there's no such thing as an Israeli refugee is finally getting through.

Israel has always denied it produces refugees, and says claimants' stories of persecution there are spurious.

In 1998, Canada's national acceptance rate of Israeli refugees fell to just two percent, compared to four percent in 1997 and 7.5 percent in 1996.

By contrast, the acceptance rate from Israel peaked in 1994 at 50 percent of all claims.

Again last year, almost all the asylum-seekers from Israel argued their cases in Montreal, where in the past, IRB panels have been more likely to believe allegations that Israel persecutes its immigrants.

This year though, even the numbers from Montreal are way down.

Of 888 cases finalized there, just 12 were accepted. In Toronto, 91 cases were finalized, and eight were accepted, while in Ottawa, four cases were accepted based on six claims.

The tumbling acceptance rates may go some way toward patching up an old dispute between Canada and Israel.

Since 1989, when the first wave of Jews were allowed to leave the Soviet Union, Israel has been trying to persuade Canada that ex-Soviets are taking advantage of the Law of Return to springboard to this country.

Typically, former Soviet Jews, who come here as Israeli citizens, claim that while in the Jewish state, they were harassed, denied jobs and housing, and even beaten because of mixed marriages or questionable Jewish status.

To qualify as refugees here, they must prove they have a well-founded fear of persecution should they be returned to Israel.

In a statement, Israel's embassy in Ottawa said the drop in the accept rate is "a positive development, but it is still two percent too many.

"In a democratic and law-based society such as Israel, there can be no justification for refugees, as there are sufficient judicial avenues for persons suffering grievances."

Story told of Syria's ransomed Jews

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – She played "a terrible game" and won.

Working with smugglers and bribing officials, Judy Feld Carr smuggled scores of Jews out of Syria, in a cloak-and-dagger operation worthy of a John Le Carre thriller.

"This exodus," she said last week at Beth Tzedec Synagogue, "didn't lend itself to public disclosure. Any publicity would have immediately endangered lives. This enterprise was carried out in the utmost secrecy."

As if to underline the point, she declared, "We were buying Jews, one by one, from a hostile government. It was the best-kept secret in the Jewish world."

Feld Carr acknowledged that the Israeli government, the Jewish Agency and Israel's intelligence service knew what she was up to. But even they had no idea how she did it.

For 25 years, she championed the cause of Syrian Jewry, providing financial assistance and medical aid to Jews in need, but above all, spiriting men, women and children across mined borders out of Syria.

In all, she facilitated the escape of some 3,000 Jews.

Feld Carr recalled her "dream-like escapades" and life of "international intrigue" at a book launching of The Ransomed of God: The Remarkable Story Of One Woman's Role in the Rescue of Syrian Jews, written by Toronto academic Harold Troper and published by Malcolm Lester Books. (See review on page 11).

During these years, she said, she lived two separate lives, firstly as a mother and a music teacher, and secondly as an activist in the service of Syrian Jews, who were harassed and persecuted by their government.

She thanked her second husband Donald Carr for his support. "He was my rock, my strength," she gushed.

She also thanked Beth Tzedec for taking the Dr. Ronald (Rubin) Feld Fund for Jews in Arab Lands under its wing.

The fund, established in 1973 and nurtured by private donors, made it possible to rescue Syrian Jews.

Feld Carr expressed pride in not having taken "one cent" from the organized Jewish community to run the campaign.

Praising Troper's book as an "inspired piece of writing," she said he had not only captured the essence of the story, but had learned of events she had not even known about.

By her estimation, only 48 Jews still live in Syria. The vast majority are in Damascus, and they are left alone by the government.

In 1994, Syria officially permitted its Jewish citizens to emigrate, but not directly to Israel.

She said that U.S. President George Bush and Secretary of State James Baker had promised Syrian President Hafez al-Assad that Syrian Jews would not settle in Israel. But some of them, including Syria's chief rabbi, Ibrahim Hamra, have made aliyah by way of third countries.

Suggesting that the Feld Fund is winding down now that its work is done, Feld Carr said its latest mission is buying household furniture for needy Syrian Jews in Israel.

Troper, a professor of history and philosophy at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, said that he could not have written the book without Feld Carr's cooperation. She granted him free access to her private papers. Meanwhile, former Syrian Jews consented to be interviewed.

The parties must 'right a glaring injustice'

The voters of Ontario elect a new provincial government this week. People will vote, as we always do, according to ideological preferences, firmly held beliefs, family traditions, general impressions, or even last minute whims. In the end, the people will receive, as we always do, the "government we deserve." And the Legislature will be an inexact reflection of Ontario's political face on June 3, 1999, a freeze-frame snapshot of the ebb and flow of evanescent political tides.

Over the course of the relatively short election campaign, the three contending parties have staked out their respective political territories and the three contending leaders have attempted to imprint their respective leadership traits onto the already stained blotter of the voters' psyche.

Whichever party is elected to form the next government of Ontario, it will have formidable substantive issues to confront and formidable voter concerns to calm.

One of those issues is the lingering unfairness in the school funding process for parents who send their children to non-Catholic, independent schools. The issue has vexed religious communities, including, of course, the Jewish community, ever since the government of Ontario extended full public funding for the education of all children in all grades of Catholic schools almost 15 years ago.

The benefit bestowed by the government of Ontario upon Catholic households in which the parents seek for their children a denominationally based education, but denied to non-Catholic households in which the parents seek the same benefit, is blatant, and by this time also callous discrimination.

With the election of a new government, we hope the discrimination will end, once and for all.

At a rally last month on the steps of the Ontario Legislature, Prof. Irwin Cotler of McGill University, the internationally renowned human rights advocate, forcefully and persuasively condemned the Ontario funding process for the discrimination it suffers upon Ontarians who are not Catholic.

The exclusionary funding process of the Ontario government effectively denies equal treatment to non-Catholic Ontarians, who, along with Catholic Ontarians, pay equal educational taxes. The exclusionary funding process was "an assault," he suggested, "both on the inherent dignity of the human person and the equal dignity of all persons. In effect, [the exclusionary funding process] says that some individuals and groups are more equal than others."

The cause of fair educational funding, Cotler pointed out, is at the same time, the cause of equal justice for all.

The non-Catholic groups, it must be emphasized, are not seeking public funds for the denominational portion of their education costs. They seek funds only for the general studies component of the curriculum. This includes funds for non-educational health services such as speech therapy, audiology and counselling, provided free to all other students in the province. Keith Landy, chair of the Ontario region of the Canadian Jewish Congress, referred to the Ontario government's denial of equal funding for health support services as a "glaring injustice."

Ontario's educational funding process was upheld by the Supreme Court of Canada, somewhat grudgingly it is fair to add, as constitutional and therefore legal. But it is clearly not fair.

It is our fervent hope that whichever party forms the next government, it will restore equal educational justice to all Ontarians.

But it is our unwavering expectation, that regardless of party ideology, the next government will at least right the "glaring injustice" of the denial of equal access for all Ontario students to the health support services in the educational system.

Anti-Semitism still alive and well in Hungary

In reference to the interview with Peter Munk (CJN, May 6), I wish to express my own opinion regarding the presence of anti-Semitism in Hungary.

It is very generous of Peter Munk to forgive the Hungarian people for the atrocities committed against Jews on the grounds that "today's generation had nothing to do with what happened there in 1944 and before." But I cannot bring myself to be so generous!

I was born and bred in Budapest. Ninety percent of my family was rounded up and handed over to the Nazis. My father and my uncles were killed while serving in a forced labor camp. My mother survived by hiding with an exceptional Christian family. My brother and I were scheduled to be shipped to Auschwitz with the rest of the children and the elderly remaining in Budapest. Fortunately, the Russians surrounded the city before our train was assembled. Unable to send us to the camp, the Hungarian authorities confined us to the ghetto. Most Hungarians, responding to a long tradition of anti-Semitism, enthusiastically supported the Nazis and the puppet Hungarian government.

Liberated on Jan. 18, 1945, I continued to live in Budapest until the Hungarian Revolution in 1956. What has been little noted, is that the Hungarian Revolution was directed not only at the Russians but also at the Jews. In many of the smaller communities, Jews were attacked and beaten to death. In Budapest, on the second day of the revolution, large billboards proclaimed, "Itzik, Itzik. Beware. We don't need to send our Jews to Auschwitz."

While the Russians and the Hungarians were fighting in the streets, my family and all the tenants of our apartment house took shelter in the building's bomb shelter. Before long, a 16-year-old Hungarian boy, armed with a submachine-gun, entered the shelter and demanded to know if there were any Jews. Our landlord, who was in the shelter with his tenants, shouted, "There are no Jews here." If he had not done so, the boy was prepared to shoot us on the spot.

We left Hungary in November 1956, but I have returned to Hungary to visit relatives almost every year since 1982. I wish I could say that anti-Semitism is dead in Hungary, but unfortunately, strong signs of its survival are everywhere. On Buda's heights, the wall of the castle was adorned with a huge swastika accompanied by references to "Dirty Jews."

I would be happy to share with Mr. Munk my video of this stressful scene at the Halasz Bastya.

The sad fact, is that anti-Semitism has not died out in Hungary. It remains embedded in the present generation just as strongly as in their grandparents' generation. Nazi-style salutes and huge flags resembling the Nazi swastika are widely displayed. Traditions long held die hard, Mr. Munk.

Five Jews have attained rank of general

Re the article (CJN, May 20) in which mention is made of the forthcoming promotion of Col. Ed Fitch to the rank of general, and that he will become "Canada's first Jewish General."

We have had a number of Jews, in Canada's Armed Forces, who have served as generals. Here is a list of four that I am very familiar with, namely: Maj. General R.P. Rothchilde, Air-Vice Marshall Cornblatt, Air-Vice Marshall Wiser, Air Commodore Lipton.

The latter three R.C.A.F. officers' ranks are equivalent to major general (2) and brigadier general. Brigadier General, I assume, will be Col. Fitch's new rank. And I wish him a sincere mazel tov and a yasher koach.

Kosher meals on planes should cost more

I know that pressure can be applied to any airlines contemplating charging more to Jewish passengers who want to follow the dietary laws. The result will be that kosher food will not rise in price. For it would be idiotic for any airline to try to recoup a few bucks and possibly run into a public relations nightmare. But I for one, think that kosher meals, because they cost more to produce, should cost more for those who insist on eating kosher.

I may not be traditional in the orthodox sense, but I suggest that Jews over the centuries have had a sharp sense of justice and fairness. In this way, I am quite traditional.

Seeks news of Abraham Brenner or family

Recently, a letter was brought into the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre (MHMC) archives by David Berger. He found it among the possessions of his brother who had been the editor of the "Y" Beacon in past years.

We are anxious to trace the family of the writer, Abraham Brenner, or, even more wonderful, Abraham Brenner himself, if he is alive.

Anyone who has information could call the MHMC at (514) 345-2605.

Barak wants IDF out of Lebanon

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

If Ehud Barak, the prime minister-elect, who will apparently also be the next defence minister, is as serious as he seems to be about his intent to get the Israel Defence Forces out of Lebanon within a year, we must be prepared for a chain reaction that is sure to include some drawbacks.

One result, will be an increase in the number of South Lebanon Army (SLA) people seeking to protect themselves, in ways ranging from seeking to move with their families to Israel or somewhere outside the region, or even forming some kind of cooperation with the Hezbollah.

The dispute within the IDF, between those who support withdrawing from South Lebanon and those who oppose it, is sure to heat up.

Disagreements within the IDF are nothing new. There were disagreements over the Bar-Lev Line and over Ariel Sharon's preparations for the Lebanon War. As long as the argument is over operational matters, it should even be encouraged. But when disagreement turns into a military-political debate, and one that makes headlines, it hurts the army. In addition, some officers, for opportunistic reasons, are sure to shape their opinions to fit that of their new boss.

There is another serious phenomenon that could develop among combat soldiers and junior officers, as a result of a protracted waiting period before a final decision is taken.

If it is decided that the north and its communities can be defended more effectively from the international border in one year's time, then what is the point of continuing to endanger their lives in the security zone and beyond? This is a well-known syndrome among soldiers, when everyone does their best to avoid injury on the eve of the ceasefire.

Many soldiers and junior officers, and of course their families, are likely to think that no person has the moral right to demand that they endanger their lives in operations north of the border when the intention is to withdraw from the area in the near future.

Barak's declaration of his intent to withdraw troops from south Lebanon is also sure to affect the negotiating tactics of the Syrians. The prime minister-elect must be prepared for the Syrians to demand a high price or to delay the negotiations. Will Barak carry out a unilateral withdrawal, just so that he can say he stood by his election promise to get the IDF out of Lebanon? And if so, then why wait a year, or up to a year, until the withdrawal? Why not speed it up?

The new, post-election reality demands a few practical conclusions.

First, if Barak does intend to keep his promise to withdraw from south Lebanon, then he must begin negotiations with the Syrians without delay. Second, Israel's first condition in these negotiations must be to maintain its unequivocal demand for quiet in south Lebanon for the duration of the talks. Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres were not firm about this demand, and the results were Operation Accountability, which Barak was in charge of as chief of staff, and Grapes of Wrath, with all their ramifications.

That's not all: It might run counter to operational logic, but moral logic and responsibility for the IDF's combat troops dictate that from the moment the countdown begins on withdrawing from Lebanon, the IDF ought to hold back, avoid significant offensive activities in Lebanon and concentrate on only those necessary operations of a clearly defensive nature.

If a Lebanon withdrawal is carried out with Syrian and Lebanese agreement, the IDF will have to vacate and destroy a few positions beyond the border. It is better to instruct the IDF to prepare for the new line rather than to face last-minute pressures. We must also not wait until the negotiations are completed before finding solutions for SLA soldiers who will want Israeli help. Whatever happens in this sensitive area could create a precedent for anyone wishing to co-operate with Israel in the future

There were secret talks with Syria

JERUSALEM — In ongoing secret talks with Damascus through various mediators, outgoing Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu agreed in principle to a significant withdrawal from the Golan Heights as part of a peace agreement and security arrangements.

Then-defence minister Yitzhak Mordechai was in on the plans, and agreed to them. A variety of drafts were drawn up, but none were ultimately implemented because Netanyahu repeatedly recoiled from committing himself at the last minute.

Involved in the mediating efforts were, among others, Oman's Foreign Minister Yusuf Ben Alawi, the European Union (EU) special envoy to the Middle East Miguel Moratinas, and American tycoon Ronald Lauder.

The United States received only general updates on the talks, usually late and incomplete, said U.S. sources. According to the sources, the Syrians kept Washington informed of the mediation efforts when Israel did not.

Maj.-Gen. (Res.) Danny Yatom represented Israel in the initial "rapprochement talks" with Syrian Ambassador to the U.S. Walid Mualem, which were held in the summer of 1997 and mediated by U.S. special Middle East envoy Dennis Ross. Mualem had headed the Syrian delegation for talks with Israel in the days of prime ministers Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres. Yatom went to Washington three or four times in an effort to reach a new "non-paper" that would allow the Netanyahu government to improve its positions in the security arrangements.

The new document presented by Yatom was written by then-head of the planning division Maj.-Gen. Shaul Mofaz, with Yatom and the prime minister's political adviser Uzi Arad. The details were approved by the general staff. One of the meetings was held in Mordechai's Tel Aviv office and was attended, by, among others, then-chief of staff Amnon Lipkin-Shahak.

Yatom's mission came to an end after the Mossad's failed assassination attempt against senior Hamas official Khaled Meshal in Jordan.

Arad was then appointed to handle the Syrian file, and efforts focused on finding a connection to Damascus without U.S. help. About then, Mordechai asked France to intervene in South Lebanon. At this stage, Israel had contacts with Damascus on two tracks, the Omani track and the EU track, according to Israeli and U.S. sources. While the Omani track soon fizzled, Morinatas's efforts are continuing until this day.

The Omani mediation efforts apparently began toward the end of 1997, with Syrian President Hafez Assad's blessing. Netanyahu sent Arad to the meetings, which were held in various venues outside the Middle East, including India and Switzerland. The aim was to formulate a document that would bring the Syrians and the Israelis to direct talks in Oman. The parties agreed on a 15-article document drawn up by the Omanis. The Syrians say Israel refused to supply written commitments, so the talks came to a halt.

Moratinas's initiative continued. Moritanas's document of principles is known to have dealt with disarmament zones and diminishing the forces on the Golan Heights and eastward after an Israeli withdrawal. Moratinas's efforts were stopped when elections were announced in Israel, and he is expected to try to resume them now that Prime Minister-elect Ehud Barak has been elected.

Lauder ran the third track to bypass Washington. Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon was also let in on the secret at this stage. Lauder flew to the area in his private plane seven or eight times to hold high-level meetings, including a meeting with Assad in Damascus. The efforts continued until the Wye conference, and stopped because of the elections.

Responding to a question about the seriousness of the mediation efforts, U.S. sources said Lauder's efforts were considered very advanced.

A true savior revealed

Several months ago, Mr. R.B. Shields of Toronto called me with a question: Was I acquainted with Frank Foley? The name rang no bells. "Have you ever heard of the man who is said to have saved 10,000 Jews from being killed?" I had not. Frank Foley was not a name I could recall.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

A little later, Shields was good enough to drop off a book at my office: a biography of Foley written by Michael Smith, a well-known British journalist with a number of highly acclaimed intelligence reports to his credit. The book has just come out, and at the first opportunity I began to read it. Its title is, Foley – The Spy Who Saved Ten Thousand Jews. Anyone who can lay claim to that kind of achievement is worth reading about, I said to myself, and I was not disappointed. On the contrary.

Foley, a short unassuming man had been assigned as a passport officer at the British Consulate in Berlin, and in that position he managed, during the Hitler years, to issue the coveted papers of admission to England that would enable the bearer to flee Germany and seek refuge abroad.I well remember the location of the office on Tiergartenstrasse, for I often saw the long line of Jews and other "undesirables" who tried to leave the country.

Foley was in fact a spy for the British who, at danger to his own life, managed to obtain vital information about the Nazi war machine, and at the same time made it possible for uncounted numbers of Jews to escape the Nazi monsters.

As I was reading the fascinating details of this book, which often resembles a masterful cops-and-robbers story, it occurred to me that Foley may have been the very man who made it possible for my parents to flee to Britain in early 1939, a few months before the war broke out.

Foley was remarkable in that he had no diplomatic immunity and was liable to be arrested at any time. He not only went into the concentration camps to get Jews out, he hid them in his very own home, helped them to get forged passports, and ignored the rules that restricted visas for Palestine. One Jewish aide worker estimated that he had saved upward of 10,000 people from the Holocaust.

At the 1961 trial of Adolf Eichmann, Foley was described as a "Scarlet Pimpernel" who risked his own life to save Jews. But he remains virtually unknown, largely because, as a passport control officer in Berlin, his job was a cover for his real role: the head of the British intelligence operations in Germany's capital.

At the outskirts of Kibbutz Harel, near Jerusalem, stands a memorial stone that recalls, in Hebrew and in English: "Major Francis Edward Foley, England." It stands in the midst of a grove of thousands of pine trees, each one donated by someone that Foley had saved. The dedication took place jn 1989. He had died in his early 70s.

Why has Yad Vashem not acknowledged him as one of the Righteous Gentiles? Its officials have said that not enough proof had been introduced to award him that posthumous distinction. I hope that with the publication of Smith's detailed record, these doubts will melt away and Frank Foley will be publicly recognized as one of the Tzaddikei Ha-olam.

The Shas factor

As prime minister-elect, Ehud Barak undertakes the arduous process of forming a coalition government. The question on everyone's mind is, "What about Shas?" Shas has grown in numbers to 17 seats, making it a formidable political force, and one that is ignored by any prime minister at his peril.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

Shas' phenomenal growth over a short 15-year period can be attributed to several factors. First, there is the unique brew of ethnic pride, religious tradition and social services that it offers its voters who are Sephardi in origin, and who occupy the traditional centre in the Israeli political map.

For the most part, they are not as observant as the party leadership, but they respond warmly to the link to tradition and values it represents. For those in development towns and poor urban areas, the long school day and hot lunches offered by Shas are a precious commodity, which is worth a Knesset vote.

Second, since 1996, when electoral reform introduced a two-ballot system, Shas has grown stronger, like many other small and mid-sized parties. By splitting their vote, Israelis can elect a Prime Minister to lead the country, and a Knesset party that best represents them either on ideological or bread-and-butter issues. As a result, both Labor and Likud have lost parliamentary strength.

Third, since Prime Minister Netanyahu moved to implement Oslo – however grudgingly – the Israeli right has been in decline. Shas' new seats are due to the votes of disaffected Likud voters, for whom the party's historic raison d'être is less relevant.

Finally, there is the charisma and political genius of party leader Aryeh Deri. Deri has had few rivals in Israel's political history.

His particular blend of pragmatism and dogmatism, personal charm and manipulative skills catapulted him to the senior position of minister of interior, where he and the party controlled vast budgets for municipalities across the country. Earlier this year, Deri was convicted of bribery at the conclusion of a dramatic nine-year investigation and trial.

The intense debate following the conviction exposed a serious split within Israel on the issues of democracy and the rule of law, versus the power of religious law and ethnic solidarity. Deri's rallying cry throughout the election campaign was his innocence – he is appealing the conviction – and his voters responded. The lukewarm reaction of other politicians – with the exclusion of Yossi Sarid and Barak – provided proof positive of the political power wielded by Shas.

Barak's campaign promise not to negotiate with Deri, brought him votes. So did his promise to create a broad coalition that would represent a strong majority in the Knesset and the public. Now that he is elected, and Deri has resigned from the Knesset (but not as chairman of the party), Barak's dilemma is whether to go with Shas after all. If he leaves Shas out, he will be accused of ignoring the traditional Sephardi voters, and Shas will play on its victimization and its exclusion by the elite again.

If Barak includes Shas, he will be accused of caving in to the party's demands for senior government posts, access to government funds, and occasional religious legislation that deters even traditional Israelis. In fact, another potential coalition partner, Shinui, won six seats strictly on a platform opposing religious coercion, targeted at the haredi parties.

Since the election, the call for inclusion of Shas has come from surprising quarters. Several liberal commentators have argued that leaving Shas out will perpetuate the alienation of the Labor party from the Israeli centre and development towns. They challenge Barak to bring Shas into the government because of its basic moderation on the peace issue, and because it is an authentic voice for its constituency.

At the same time, they urge him to undermine Shas' niche as a provider of social services by reintroducing elements of the Israeli welfare state. To use a Canadian analogy, Shas has become an alternative service provider – albeit with government funds promised in coalition negotiations. Shlomo Ben Ami, a senior Labor politician, has argued for years that Shas moved into the vacuum created by the withdrawal of government from the education and social services arena. Only government-sponsored services provided on an equitable basis can challenge Shas' power in this area.

The challenge posed by Shas, therefore, goes beyond its identity as a religious party. It brings into sharp focus several of the fissures dividing Israelis today – the attitude towards democracy and the judiciary, the ethnic split, the gap between rich and poor, and the debate on the nature of civil society and community. How Barak handles this challenge will be a harbinger of the direction he will take as prime minister.

Israel-Diaspora ties in Barak era

What effect, if any, will Ehud Barak's election victory have on the ties between Israel and North American Jewry? A New York Times op-ed article of May 16, focused on the relative disinterest among American Jews in the campaign. New York State politician Dov Hikind found greater disinterest now than three years earlier, even in the Orthodox community. Journalist J.J. Goldberg and sociologist Steven M. Cohen argued that there was a general decline in interest in Israel among American Jews, based on their interviews and scientific surveys.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

Forget for a moment about the small band of communal machers, devoted Zionists, or ex-Israelis, who take these things ultra-seriously, and follow every nuance of the convoluted Israeli political map. It is not clear whether Barak's election, while probably welcomed by most North American Jews, will smooth over some of the demographic and socio-cultural differences.

There are still strong ties to Israel, though they are much stronger in Canada than in the United States. According to 1990 surveys, – American percentages are in brackets – 66 percent of Canadian Jews have visited Israel (35 percent), 37 percent have spoken by telephone with an Israeli (10 percent), and fully 87 said Israel is very important to their being a Jew (73 percent). Yet only 42 percent said they felt "very close" to Israel (22 percent) and 35 percent said they could live a fuller Jewish life there (10 percent).

Two processes are going on. First, the twin motivations underpinning Diaspora involvement with Israel – worry and pride – have been eroded since their peak in 1967. Rightly or wrongly, Israel is no longer seen as militarily endangered or as poor. And a combination of blunders and scandals may have overshadowed her stupendous – and they are stupendous – achievements. For some, they may have confirmed the early Zionist expectation that Israel would become a normal country after all.

Second, there is a growing gap between North American Judaic culture and that found in Israel. Religion in Israel remains polarized between those who are Orthodox, or haredi, and those who are secular. Here I disagree with some analysts who claim that there is a growing embrace of Jewish tradition by the non-Orthodox.

It is still the case that in Israel the Conservative, Reform and Reconstructionist movements are small – may they grow – and draw support largely from former North Americans. Innovations and experiments like chavurot, egalitarian Orthodox minyanim, Jewish renewal groups, women's minyanim, real bat mitzvahs, or gay shuls, are rare or non-existent.

Despite their valiant efforts, people like David Hartman and Avram Burg remain marginal to the Orthodox community. Few Israeli synagogues include the rich menu of guest speakers, lecturers, symposia, study groups and other activities found in North American congregations of all denominations.

On the other hand, there are still many secular Israelis for whom the High Holy Days remain days devoted to going to the beach or on bicycle outings. This estrangement from all forms of religion was symbolized when Yitzhak Rabin's son recited Kaddish at his father's funeral; it seemed by his delivery that he was thoroughly unfamiliar with the text. There may be more, not less, religious polarization in the new Knesset.

There is no reason why Israelis should transform their national culture to suit the tastes of North American Jews. Israelis contribute to Jewish survival in many very real, heroic ways. And Israeli culture, schools, art and daily life reinforce Judaism, in the Israeli form, directly and indirectly. Among the many "tribes" of Israel – haredi, dati, Sephardi, Russian, left-wing secular, right-wing settlers, and of course the Arabs – there is little room for western liberal/traditional Jews.

It is not clear how Barak's victory can change any of that. Those of us who love Israel may have to continue to love her as she is, not as we would like her to be. As I have argued before, it may be that in two or three generations, the tie to Israel among most non-Orthodox will be like Italian Canadians and Americans to Italy. Should, alas, that be the case, I still feel both Israel and North American Jewry will survive.

The Kirshner File

'Mrs. Judy' and the Jews of Syria

She was known as "Mrs. Judy," the Torontonian whose unflagging crusade on behalf of Syrian Jewry earned Judy Feld Carr this moniker. Over a 25-year period, Feld Carr devoted herself selflessly to a Jewish community burdened by a web of onerous restrictions. She not only funnelled funds and religious articles to Syrian Jews, but helped about 3,000 of them to emigrate.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

She worked with smugglers, bribed officials and shared information with the Israeli secret service, all in single-minded devotion to Syrian Jewry.

Five years after the Syrian government permitted the remaining Jews of Syria to depart, Harold (Hesh) Troper has written a thoughtful, fast-paced book about Feld Carr and the international campaign she personified. The Ransomed of God: The Remarkable Story of One Woman's Role in the Rescue of Syrian Jews will be published by Malcolm Lester Books on June 4.

In an interview, Troper, a professor of history and philosophy at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, described his book as "unauthorized, uncommissioned and scrupulously honest."

To get the story right, which he called "absolutely fascinating and compelling," Troper pored over primary historical materials, such as Feld Carr's personal papers and Canadian Jewish Congress archives, and spoke to individuals who had a direct knowledge of the events.

He interviewed Feld Carr 25 times, first in August 1993 and finally in July 1997, and then allowed her to read the completed manuscript so as to avoid factual errors. "I think she's very happy with the book, though she questioned the tone here and there."

Troper, co-author of the acclaimed None Is Too Many: Canada and the Jews of Europe, 1933-1948, originally intended to write a comparative study of rescue efforts of Syrian and Soviet Jews. But as he delved into the subject, he was increasingly drawn to Syria and its Jewish community. Many of its members could trace their roots to the returnees from the Babylonian captivity.

In this century, Syrian Jews became a target of hostility with the passage of the 1947 United Nations Palestine partition plan. The scheme aroused widespread anger in Syria, a bastion of Arab nationalism, and touched off an orgy of anti-Jewish riots in Aleppo. As a result of the disturbances, many of Syria's 40,000 Jews fled, leaving a residue of some 5,000 Jews in Damascus, Aleppo and Qamishli, and prompting the authorities to prohibit further emigration. Syria, Israel's sworn enemy, feared that Jewish emigrants would settle in Israel. In fact, the majority went to the United States.

In 1954 and in 1958, Syria temporarily lifted the ban. With the reimposition of the prohibition, Syria cracked down on the Jewish community, stamping Jews' identity cards in red with the Arabic word Mussawi (follower of Moses), constraining their business and social activities, limiting their right to buy and sell property and censoring their mail and telephone calls.

Israel's victory in the 1967 Six Day War ushered in a rash of arbitrary arrests and tortures, looting and confiscation of property and a series of new discriminatory edicts in commerce and education.

Feld Carr, a music teacher and Zionist who identified strongly with the plight of Soviet Jewry, was converted to the cause of Syrian Jewry by Meir Kahane, the leader of the militant Jewish Defence League. He claimed that mainstream Jewish leaders were neglecting this oppressed community. Jewish organizations, namely the World Jewish Congress, began working for Syrian Jewry in the early 1970s.

Harold (Hesh) Troper
[Ron Silvers photo]

Feld Carr and her first husband, Rubin Feld, who died in 1973, were deeply involved with Syrian Jews. Working out of their home, they publicized the predicament of Syrian Jews and fought for their right to emigrate.

According to Troper, the Canadian Jewish Congress initially favored quiet diplomacy to ease their conditions. But in May 1972, Congress declared Syrian Jewish Solidarity Month and agreed to establish a committee of concern to which Jews and non-Jews were invited to join.

Congress regarded Feld Carr as an energetic but naive outsider, and merely tolerated her. Troper contends that her "headstrong style," her penchant for secrecy and her disinclination to court potential supporters proved costly. She received little financial and staff help from Congress.

"Judy was not a team player," observes Troper. "She remained something of a loner."

But with her marriage to Donald Carr, a Congress activist, Feld Carr's profile in the community rose immeasurably. Syd Harris, Congress' national president, created a committee on Jews in Arab Lands, and appointed her chair. By Troper's estimation, this development went a long way toward ensuring that Syrian Jewry was given due prominence on Congress' agenda.

As she sought to upgrade the importance of Syrian Jewry in Congress' priorities, Feld Carr lobbied the Canadian government. Occasionally, she clashed with federal cabinet ministers. Feld Carr believed that Ottawa could do more for Syrian Jews, particularly with respect to their admission into Canada. Further, the dark picture she painted of their status was not shared by the Department of External Affairs. Canada concurred that their situation was precarious, but maintained that there was no evidence of persecution.

"Canada did not see a clear and present danger to Syrian Jews, but acknowledged that Jews were suffering," said Troper in an interview. "There were times when Canada could have done more, and times when it did more than could have been expected."

But from the 1980s onward, he argued, Canada exerted a positive influence in helping shape conditions for Jews in Syria. Troper conceded that Feld Carr would probably disagree with this assessment.

Tracing the trajectory of her contributions to Syrian Jewry, Troper mentioned the parcels of religious articles and money she sent, the medical care she provided for Aleppo's ailing rabbi in Toronto, the fictional Canadian marriages she concocted for Syrian Jewish women, the bribes she paid for exit visas, the crusade she launched for the imprisoned Swed brothers, and the Torahs and holy books she arranged to be smuggled out of Syria.

Feld Carr, we're told, had "a long and fractious" relationship with Israeli intelligence, conveying vital information to Israel. Troper says that Israel worked behind the scenes to ensure that Syria's treatment of its Jews would not go unreported or unpublicized. By the same token, the World Jewish Congress and the American Joint Distribution Committee were infinitely helpful in earmarking the cause of Syrian Jewry for political action and in channelling funds into the community.

Syrian officials were not unaware of Feld Carr's activities, but tolerated them for their own good reasons. Certainly, they were cognizant of her meetings with Rabbi Ibrahim Hamra of Damascus. In April 1992, he convinced President Hafez al-Assad to release the Sweds. But it took more than polite cajoling to persuade Assad that Jews should be permitted to leave Syria legally.

Syria's participation in the Gulf War, the collapse of the Soviet Union and the advent of bilateral peace talks between Syria and Israel were all developments which induced Assad to promise Syrian Jews equal rights as citizens and emigration privileges.

By the mid-1990s, virtually every Jew who wanted to leave had left Syria. Mrs. Judy had triumphed.

Is settlement in Israel obligatory or voluntary?

By ZVI SLOTKI

"And you shall live in [the land of Israel]"

There is a dispute between contemporary scholars on whether aliyah is a positive commandment or not.

Guest Voices

Rabbi Moshe Feinstein, who lived in the United States, and Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, former chief rabbi of Israel, are at odds over whether settlement in Israel is an obligatory or voluntary act.

Rabbi Yosef maintains that the commandment to settle in the land is an unconditional positive precept.

Rabbi Feinstein dissents. In his magnum opus, Iggrot Moshe, even ha'ezer 1 No. 102, he distinguishes between two distinct categories of positive commandments.

There are precepts which are mandatory -- for example, circumcision and tfillin and others which are not mandated as obligatory responsibilities, but nevertheless when performed, constitute fulfilment of a commandment.

Rabbi Feinstein maintains that even according to Nachmanides (who included the above precept as one of the positive mitzvot of the Torah), residence in Eretz Yisrael is not obligatory.

Because this precept is not a mandatory one, according to this interpretation, Nachmanides' position is that the act of dwelling in Israel constitutes the voluntary fulfilment of a commandment.

Rabbi Yosef, on the other hand, asserts that this commandment does constitute a mandatory obligation, even in our day, and that it is a mitzvah "to ascend to the land of Israel."

The nature and scope of the problem is brought into sharper focus by the following practical illustration: Are children, for instance, permitted to immigrate to Israel despite their parents' objections? Or does the fulfilment of the commandment to honor one's parents take precedence? Again, the sources present conflicting views.

Rav Ami, with the sanction of Rabbi Vochanan, left the Holy Land for the purpose of meeting his mother (Kiddushim 3.6). This implies that the mitzvah of honoring one's parents takes precedence over staying in the land.

On the other hand, Naomi's sons were punished with an early death because they left the land of Israel in deference to the wishes of their father.

The general principle in Jewish tradition is, that honor due to parents should not conflict with the performance of religious precepts.

Both parents and children are obliged to honor the Almighty, a message that finds its expression in the observance of mitzvot.

Honoring parents remains, as always, important, and undertaking aliyah, despite parental objections, must be done with consideration and sensitivity – and deep respect.

Anne Frank on the Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

One of the most famous victims of the Holocaust would have turned 70 this month. Annelies Marie Frank was born on June 12, 1929 in Frankfurt, Germany and died of typhus at the age of 16 in Bergen-Belsen. Two years later, The Diary Of A Young Girl was published and became one of the best selling books of all time. Through her diary, the memory of Anne Frank has lived on as a passionate, eloquent voice of the Shoah.

Today, a look at Anne Frank on the World Wide Web.

Anne Frank Online is a very good introduction to her life and work [http://www. annefrank.com/]. In addition to a biography, there are selected entries from the diary and a photo scrapbook of Anne's life and family. The centre operates a travelling exhibit and also presents the annual Spirit of Anne Frank Awards which honors people who exemplify the ideals of Anne Frank. And for straightforward information, don't miss the Anne Frank FAQ (Frequently Asked Questions) [http://www.mango.ds.to/annefrank/faq.txt].

Nothing can compare to walking the narrow staircase and peering through the windows of The Anne Frank House in Amsterdam. However, the house's Web site does a good job of recreating some of the most dramatic sights of Anne's "Secret Annexe" [http://www.annefrank.nl/]. Through photos of the stark walls and excerpts of Anne's diary in her own handwriting, this Web site does a good job of telling the story through archival and contemporary photos. Because of tremendous interest in Anne Frank, the house is expanding this year to include additional exhibits [http://www.annefrank.nl/htmleng/news/toekomst.cfm?id=1].

Of course, there are many other museums devoted to the story of Anne Frank . You can follow her story while visiting New York, Philadelphia [http: //www.mango.ds.to/annefrank/museums.html] and in Anne Frank's birthplace [http://www.anne-frank.org/ewelcome.htm].

Anne and her family were not alone in their fate. In a lecture presented to the University of South California, Anthony Anderson looks at the systematic persecution of Jews in wartime Holland which led to the destruction of 70 percent of that community [http://www-lib.usc.edu/~anthonya/holo.htm].

There are dozens of Anne Frank sites, and one of the best indexes of those sites can be found at [http://www-th. phys.rug.nl/~ma/annefrank.html].

I was fascinated to learn that this excellent page was compiled by Dr. Whee Ky Ma of the Institute for Theoretical Physics at the University of Groningen, Netherlands.

What accounts for the power of the diary? Michael Berenbaum's eloquent answer to that question can be found at the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum [http://www.mango.ds.to/annefrank/world.html].

"Anne captivates us with her wit and her sensibility. It is easy to identify with the teenager whose life, even in hiding, epitomizes the struggle of adolescents everywhere as they grow to adulthood. One moment Anne is in despair, the next she is filled with hope... Her dreams, her fears, and her doubts are universal... But because we know that Anne did not survive, that this life of enormous potential was snuffed out in the Holocaust, the diary has a poignancy that is at once unbearable and transfiguring. Through this attractive young woman the Holocaust is made real: Anne Frank has become for our time the emblem of lost possibility."

Next week, Anne Frank's diary — in print, on the stage and in movies.

Midrashic Moments

Abstaining from gossip

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

In the upcoming Torah readings, Miriam acquires leprosy for gossiping with Aaron about Moses. According to the text, they are discussing Moses' relationship with his wife, or lack thereof.

The midrash and commentaries suggest that the discussion centres on how Moses is no longer sexually intimate with his wife and has moved out. From there, the gossip takes on the flavor of jealousy as they compare their closeness with God to Moses' closeness. They believe that God has also spoken with them, and therefore Moses is not a greater leader. The incident raises several questions.

Why is Miriam the only one punished for the sin? Clearly they have both sinned by engaging in the conversation.

The midrash and Talmud emphasize the seriousness of gossiping. It is likened to murder. The analogy is to killing someone with a bow and arrow. Once the arrow is shot, it cannot be controlled. It may find its victim, as well as several other victims along the way. There is no ability to stop at the last moment and call back the arrow – the damage is random and extensive. Yet, both Aaron and Miriam were speaking but only Miriam is punished.

A close reading of the text reveals a grammatical anomaly. Although both are speaking, the verb "to speak" appears in the singular feminine form. The commentaries unanimously agree that Miriam initiated the conversation and therefore the verb appears as speaking only of her. Because she begins the gossip and draws Aaron in, she is first to be punished. When Aaron sees what has happened to her, he immediately apologizes and is spared.

Why is leprosy the punishment? In fact, leprosy is traditionally the punishment for gossiping. It is actually quite appropriate, since leprosy is a fatal illness that begins on the skin and works its way to the internal organs. It physically mirrors the harm that gossiping causes. It attacks from the outside and moves inward. Just like gossiping, it is highly contagious.

Lastly, where does Miriam get the information about Moses' private life? According to the midrash, Miriam and Moses' wife were watching the appointments of the elders. Moses' wife mentions to Miriam that she feels badly for the elders' wives as now their husbands' ties to them will be disrupted by their leadership roles.

Miriam assumed she was listening to the voice of experience and concluded that Moses was no longer intimate with his wife. Since men are commanded to be fruitful and multiply, Miriam is not only commenting on Moses' personal life but is also implicitly accusing Moses of committing a sin.

The text and the rabbis are sending a clear message about drawing lines. Leaders become easy targets for gossip. One may legitimately discuss their decisions as leaders but is one allowed to discuss their private affairs, even if a sin has been committed?

The answer we learn from Miriam is that no gossiping is allowed. The one exception is when there is the intent of helping someone in trouble. Aside from this, whether a person is a leader or a member of the community, one must never gossip. As Israel changes its leadership and Ontario enters the electoral process, it is indeed a timely message.

Exploring pious Jews

Books
Bernard Baskin

For the Relief of Unbearable Urges*, by Nathan Englander (Knopf, $31).

Nathan Englander, 29, grew up in Long Island N.Y., attended a yeshiva through the twelfth grade and has lived in Jerusalem for the past several years. There he became, he reports, "a cultural Jew," shedding the rigid orthodoxy of his youth.

He is now a celebrity. The Relief of Unbearable Urges which contains nine short stories has aroused unusual interest. It became the object of a spirited publishers' auction, and the fledgling author (this is his first book) was endowed with a hefty $200,000 advance for the book and for a contemplated novel.

What is the literary furor all about? Englander uses his considerable knowledge of traditional Jewish life and observance to place pious Jews in tragicomic situations. His characters search for halachic or rabbinic solutions to problems that are largely bizarre and highly contrived. And these taut, edgy, strange stories, usually with murky and unresolved conclusions are obsessively readable.

In the title story, a devout Chassid, whose wife inexplicably spurns his amorous advances, is given a dispensation by his Rebbe — in order to save his marriage — to visit a prostitute. The Chassid nervously makes his way to Tel Aviv and inexpertly "takes his medicine." When his wife is ready to respond to him he is rendered impotent through a combination of shame, guilt and fear of disease. "This couldn't possibly be the solution the Rebbe intended. Dov was supposed to be in his wife's embrace, enjoying her caresses, and instead he would get an examination table and a doctor's probing hands."

In Reb Kringle, an elderly bearded Rabbi who ekes out a meagre livelihood is induced by his wife to play the part of a department store Santa Claus. When a small boy asks for a Chanukah menorah, in addition to other holiday gifts, something denied to him by his mother's new non-Jewish husband, the rabbi is outraged. He publicly and loudly reveals his identity to an astonished group of Christian shoppers.

The Wig concerns Ruchama, an expert wigmaker for middle class orthodox women who exchange their hair after marriage for handsome wigs. Her wigs are elegant, singular and highly desirable.

One day, eager to improve her own appearance, she cajoles a delivery boy into selling his abundant and beautiful hair. The wig she fashions from his curls is a masterpiece. But, unhappily, she is actively pursued by the boy who feels that he has been cheated.

In the street "Ruchama puts a hand to her head and pulls off the wig. She stuffs it into her bag and clutches the bag to her chest. A mess of curls snakes out over the sides. Ruchama can feel people looking, the whole of the city watching. Worth every penny and every shame, she thinks, for one slow spin, hair on her head and mirror in her hand, leaning back, beautiful."

Perhaps the most memorable of the stories, The Twenty Seventh Man deals with an order from the former Soviet Union ruler, Joseph Stalin, for the arrest and murder of 26 eminent Jewish writers. But there is a 27th man arrested by mistake – a young, inexperienced and unpublished would-be writer.

While awaiting execution he polishes in his mind a few paragraphs of a story that he recites to the others – to their approval – just before death comes to them all. His perfect creation is forever lost to humanity.

These stories, with unlikely situations and even more unlikely characters, have a kind of fascination akin to those of Colombian writer, Gabriel Garcia Marquez. They will not appeal to all readers, but Englander has discovered a rich vein – hitherto largely unmined – for his fertile creative imagination.

Rabbi Schorsch set to give Rosenberg lecture

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Ismar Schorsch originally set out to become a Jewish historian.

"I have changed careers," he said from his New York office, "but my method of thinking about issues continues to be deeply colored by my training as a historian."

As chancellor of the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) since 1986, Rabbi Schorsch plays a key role in modern Jewish history, dealing with issues that didn't exist when he was ordained – the Masorti movement in Israel and the question of whether to admit openly gay students to rabbinical school, to name two of the most contentious.

On June 9 the chancellor will speak at Beth Tzedec Congregation for the annual Rabbi Stuart & Hadassa Rosenberg memorial lecture. He will discuss his concept of Conservative Judaism in an address entitled Sacredness and Sanity in an Age of Uncertainty.

Despite changes he has seen in the movement – such as the admission of women rabbinical students 15 years ago – he would argue Conservative Judaism has been "quite consistent" throughout much of its history.

The chancellor, now in his early 60s, has observed the movement's development from a close vantage point.

His father, Rabbi Emil Schorsch, was ordained at the Breslau Rabbinical Seminary, a centre for the forerunner of the Conservative movement. He himself is an alumnus of JTS, as well as Columbia University, where he received his PhD.

Today, Conservative Judaism has reached the point where the seminary offers both egalitarian and non-egalitarian minyans, but no student would eschew an egalitarian minyan, according to Rabbi Schorsch.

"We make it clear, if they're totally opposed, they don't belong at the seminary."

The chancellor believes the two minyans reflect "pluralism in action.

"There are diverse communities. That is not something to be feared. It's something to be embraced...We continue to study together, to socialize together, to eat together and on occasion even to pray together."

The question of gay and lesbian students is of far greater halachic gravity than that of women students, said Rabbi Schorsch.

Rabbi Ismar Schorsch

"The current policy is not to admit openly gay and lesbian students to rabbinical or cantorial school...The seminary, on the other hand, is a Jewish university [with] five schools, and in the other three schools, gay and lesbian students are admitted and welcomed."

Is the policy written in stone? "Institutionally, it's always open for re-examination," Rabbi Schorsch admitted. "Personally, I do not see the admission of gay and lesbian students as a possibility. I think it would profoundly change the character of Conservative Judaism."

On the Israel front, Rabbi Schorsch has tackled other weighty issues, becoming a dedicated proponent of the Masorti (Conservative) movement, and addressing the religious needs of the non-Orthodox, particularly in the areas of conversion and marriage.

"If Israel wishes to remain the centre of the Jewish world, it needs to be sensitive to the religious values and expressions of Jews in the Diaspora," said Rabbi Schorsch. "Israel cannot be identified with one denomination of contemporary Jewry as opposed to the others.

"Israel needs, like a parent, to treat its offspring with equality, fairness and respect."

"We have never been all of one stripe," Rabbi Schorsch pointed out. "There were two kingdoms in ancient Israel. Diversity is part of our lifeblood. An ideal world is not one where there is no diversity, but one where diversity can culminate in unity."

For non-Orthodox Jews to be excluded from the State of Israel, Rabbi Schorsch believes, is to weaken the ability of American Jews to resist assimilation.

In fact, the biggest issue facing the Conservative movement in North America, he said, is "the intensification of Jewish education as the most effective response to assimilation." The relationship to Israel is part of that strengthening of Jewish identity, he noted.

He cited an "explosion" in Solomon Schechter day schools, the seminary's establishment in 1996 of the first American graduate school of Jewish education, and the amount of work being done to foster "distance learning" via computer.

The chancellor, who has taken a strong public stand against Israel's chief rabbinate, believes the recent election of Ehud Barak as Israel's prime minister has "lifted the pall." He hopes it will "inaugurate a period in which religion will progressively be eliminated from politics."

As chancellor, Rabbi Schorsch believes his most important responsibility is to set the priorities of the seminary and, by extension, the Conservative movement.

About 60 percent of his time is devoted to fundraising, because 70 percent of the seminary's budget has to be raised within the Jewish community, he said.

Although he juggles multiple responsibilities, Rabbi Schorsch has never really left the field of Jewish history, teaching in the classroom every other year. "That's an exhilarating experience."

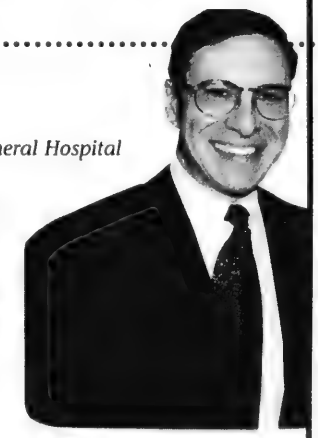
Our PEOPLE

An interview with

Dr. Mark Wainberg

President, International AIDS Society
Director, McGill AIDS Center, Jewish General Hospital



What led you to become involved in medicine? Why AIDS research in particular?
Medical research is a noble calling and, at the same time, one that poses a significant intellectual challenge. When the AIDS epidemic first surfaced, our group had been working in a related area and we were well positioned to become Canada's first lab in the field.

What advice would you give to medical students about to embark on their careers as doctors?
Think hard about pursuing a career in academic medicine. Participating in a successful drug discovery or advancing knowledge toward the conquest of disease are among the most wonderful of human experiences.

AIDS research is a very stressful environment. What do you do to relax?
I always find classical music and light opera relaxing.

What personality traits do you admire most in others?
Perseverance, hard work and a sense of humour about themselves.

Who are your heroes or role models?
My personal heroes are outstanding moral leaders and scientists. I am not one to admire overpaid athletes or movie stars.

What do you foresee as the biggest medical breakthroughs in the 21st century?
I see immense breakthroughs in the treatment of cancer and AIDS. The promise of genetic therapies will finally be realized.

What book are you currently reading?
American Pastoral by Philip Roth.

What are the most important Jewish values we can pass on to our children?
Love of G-d and Jewish unity.

What is your favourite Israeli vacation memory?
Visiting our sons in Israel when they were pursuing their post-secondary education.

What role does Israel play in your life?
I try to visit Israel several times a year for both work as well as religious reasons. I spent two years in Israel as a post-doctoral fellow and established many long-lasting friendships at that time. Our eldest son was born in Israel. Israel plays a central role in the life of our family, which is why we consider it so important to support Israel Bonds.

Community Hosts Israeli Educators

Top Ministry of Education officials from Israel recently visited Toronto for the first time to learn more about the local Jewish education system.

The delegation, which included the ministry's Deputy Director General of Development, Simcha Shnoer, met with teachers, students and representatives of UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education, to explore ways of strengthening ties between the two countries.

The visit helped to boost UJA Federation's Partnership 2000 (P2K) project, which twins North American Jewish communities with their counterparts in Israel. Coordinated by the Jewish Agency and UJA Federation, P2K links Toronto with Eilat, Israel's most southern city, and the surrounding Eilot.

Recent P2K initiatives include a new community centre, a program to upgrade teachers' skills, a Toronto/Eilat teachers' exchange and volunteer internships for Toronto teens in Eilat.

"We came to gain a better understanding of the Jewish education system because we believe there is great potential to learn from each other and work together," says Shnoer. "We realize that for Jews living outside Israel, the classroom is a very important part of being Jewish."

"It's important for us, as Israelis, to develop an appreciation of the challenges facing Diaspora Jewry such as maintaining Jewish identity," adds Yitzik Tomer, who is responsible for more than 200,000 students living between Ashdod and Eilat. "Our mission is to explore ways of connecting Jewish youth as well as adults through the education process."

Shnoer was impressed with the high level of Hebrew spoken by grade 12 CHAT students.

The growing partnership also involves ongoing programs between Eilat and Toronto students. One such project pairs the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto with Tichon Alon in Eilat. "It's all about building living bridges," explains Gary Levine, CHAT's Director of student activities. "We want to encourage as much personal interaction as possible because that's what meaningful, long lasting relationships are based upon."

Campaign For Fifty - Year II

Chairs Promise Phoning Fun

UJA Federation telethons will never be the same again according to Judy Engel, Rosanne Ain and Dov Altman, this year's energetic Telethon Co-Chairs.

"We're going to be putting the 'fun' back into fundraising," explains Altman, who is helping to spearhead the initiative to recruit more volunteers and encourage greater community participation in UJA Federation telethons.

To increase community awareness and response to telethons, which raise millions of dollars annually for Jews in need, UJA Federation is introducing a special contest beginning in September. "Anyone who picks up the phone and says 'Hi UJA, I'm answering the call," and makes an increased contribution, will be eligible, along with the volunteer who contacted the contributor, to win great prizes," explains Engel. "It's an excellent way to put UJA Federation on the lips and minds of as many community members as possible and cultivate an atmosphere of giving," adds Ain.

Rosanne Ain

This year's campaign strategy also includes assembling the largest telethon team in UJA Federation history; special programming for volunteers; prizes; and, recruiting groups of volunteers from UJA Federation beneficiary agencies, schools, synagogues and other community organizations.

Dov Altman

New telethon venues include the CN Tower. "We'll be making calls from the top of Toronto," notes Altman. "It's all part of creating a warm and welcoming environment for our hardworking volunteers."

Judy Engel

"Close to 40% of all our donations are made during telethons," says Engel, "We want the people who make the calls time after time, on behalf of the community, to know how important they are to the campaign."

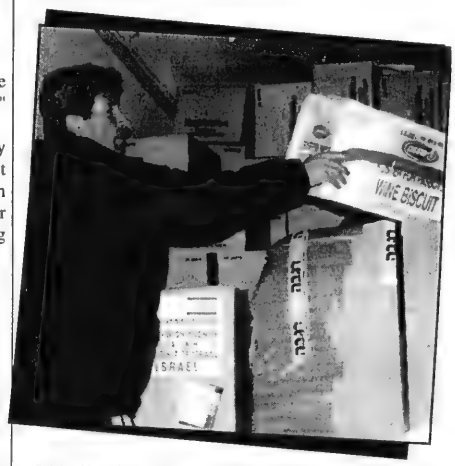
Spirit of Israel Inspires Success

Since being launched just over one year ago, Israel's first national grass roots fundraising campaign is gaining ground and adding a new dimension to Israeli philanthropy.

"The campaign is doing far better than we ever imagined," reports Joe Dushansky, Director of "Ruach Israel" – the Spirit of Israel. Linked with worldwide UJA Federation campaigns, the Spirit of Israel raises funds in Israel to help Jews in need around the world.



Spirit of Israel contributions to Jewish Agency Kosovo relief efforts helped purchase several tons of much-needed supplies.

Dushansky credits the campaign's early success – a dramatic increase from 7,200 donors in January 1998 to over 40,000 – to a nationwide television and radio advertising blitz, as well as a massive direct marketing strategy. "We sent letters to over 700,000 Israeli households and received a 3.1% response to date with replies still pouring in."

Even with reports of charitable giving in Israel as high as $400 million annually, Dushansky remained cautious about what to expect from the start. "Israelis have not traditionally been strong supporters of broadly defined Jewish causes the same way North American Jewry has," he explains. "We were starting from scratch with a whole new concept in charitable giving."

The most significant growth occurred in March and April when 19,000 donors contributed $1million (US) to the campaign to fund the Jewish Agency's relief efforts in Albania. "The response was unprecedented, yet not suprising," notes Dushansky, emphasizing the tendency among Israelis to engage in what he calls "extremely focused" giving. "Israelis seem to respond better when they are geared toward a specific crisis or project, such as building facilities for our elderly or providing adequate education for our children and new immigrants."

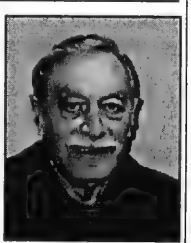
volunteer views

When it comes to volunteer work, Myer Shaw likes to be in the driver's seat.

As a Jewish Family and Child Service volunteer driver, Shaw spends six to seven hours a week behind the wheel giving rides to those in need.

Most of his passengers are children in the care of JF&CS who rely on him to get to and from weekly meetings with social workers as well as the occasional medical appointment.

"Many of the drives I do are for children living in foster homes," explains Shaw, who has six grandchildren of his own. "These kids have a lot to deal with and sometimes life isn't easy for them. The least I can do is give them a lift."



"Volunteer driving is a great way for me to keep busy and contribute to the community," says Shaw, who coincidentally drove taxis before moving into the heating business where he worked until his retirement. "It's not always easy, but I'm happy to help out."

Orthodox rabbi calls for mutual respect among Jews

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Haskel Lookstein, a prominent advocate for centrist Orthodoxy, calls himself a pragmatic pluralist.

While affirming his total personal commitment to Orthodox practice, nevertheless, he told The CJN, all Jews must learn how to get along with each other.

"In the real world, we won't agree. But we have to live together and respect each other and everyone's right to practice Judaism as he or she feels."

Rabbi Lookstein, spiritual leader of Congregation Kehilat Jeshuran and principal of Ramaz school, both in New York City, was in Toronto for the formal opening of the Louis and Leah Posluns Education Centre, the Neptune branch of Associated Hebrew Schools.

The results of the elections reflect the deeper divisions in Israeli society, he said – religious versus non-religious, Ashkenazi and Sephardi, left and right, and differences within the left and the right.

Each of these factions has withdrawn into itself, concerned with its own welfare, Rabbi Lookstein charged.

"It is very sad that in Israel today, many people and many groups think first and foremost of their own interests, and not of the state, or of klal."

If this continues, he warned, there will really be something to worry about. "The well-being of the state is more important than any political party or agenda," Rabbi Lookstein said.

While there have been very strong divisions in the past, he said, such as the arch-rivalry between David Ben-Gurion and Menachem Begin, still, "their commitment to the state transcended their individual interests."

Rabbi Haskel Lookstein

Peace within Israel is more important than that between Israel and its neighbors, he said. "If we have the latter without the former, not only won't it last, but Israel will be very vulnerable."

Similarly, he said, it is "unfortunate when a non-Orthodox leader threatens to withdraw from UJA and Israel Bonds because Israel does not recognize some rabbis' ability to perform certain functions."

Rabbi Lookstein is a strong supporter of Edah, a new organization based in New York, whose goal is to bring together those in the Orthodox centre.

"It is a great source of encouragement and inspiration to many modern Orthodox Jews to find out there are so many others who believe that you can lead a fully halachic life without withdrawing from the the community, without losing the religious significance of Israel, and without avoiding coming to terms with the changed status of women in the world, among other things," the rabbi said.

He said that as a result of the Bill Clinton-Monica Lewinsky scandal, he sees at least a partial backlash to the lack of standards in sexual behavior that exists in the western world.

In his school, Ramaz, he said, "I see that many more kids are practicing more modest behavior than my generation did.

"The trend in the whole modern Orthodox world is to become more reserved in behavior, dress, and show a more positive attachment towards mikvah, and sexual behavior in marriage determined by Halachah.

"It is a reaction to a world where there are few limits."

Candidates spar over health, environment in Oak Ridges

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Student Intern

TORONTO — Health care, education and environmental issues are at the heart of the Oak Ridges riding.

Ontario Election '99

The brand new riding has Bathurst Street as the western border until Bloomington Road, where Highway 404 extends north until Davis Drive, bordered in the east by the Pickering Town Line down to 16th Avenue. Oak Ridges includes the towns of Richmond Hill, Whitchurch-Stouffville and Markham north of 16th Avenue.

Frank Klees, 48, attempts to return for a second term in office representing the Tories. Vito Spatafora, 49, is supporting the Liberals and 27-year-old Chris Moise holds the NDP banner.

Frank Klees

Vito Spatafora

Chris Moise

Klees, a full-time politician, wishes to maintain the momentum of growth of economy that the Tories established.

He stresses that residents in Oak Ridges, with a population of just over 102,000, show overwhelming support for a track record of credibility.

"A sense of optimism and hope for the future comes with strong leadership," Klees told The CJN.

Citing housing and rent control programs, Klees believes the Tenant Protection Act of two years ago keeps rent control programs in place and creates tenant and landlord protection. If re-elected, Klees says, the private sector will have confidence to invest in rental units.

"Lower income families need assistance," he adds, "but the answer is not in mortar and bricks. We should help them through rental subsidies."

Liberal candidate Spatafora is upset at the two-tier system of health and education. He believes that education is the basis of future development of the Canadian economy.

"Knowledge is a valued commodity," he says.

Spatafora even got involved in saving one school on Squire Drive from closure.

Moise, employed as relief staff at St. Michael's Hospital, saw health care problems up close. He witnessed patients waiting three hours for attention, and nurses suffering from nervous breakdowns. He found that the only way to make a change is to get involved.

"I'm a humanist," says Moise, "and the NDP platform reflects the people in this province."

On the issue of environment, Moise speaks on the Oak Ridges natural habitat, which he believes is being over-developed. The moraines may be degrading, and pollution is on the rise, he says.

"People are upset," he says. "The average person is getting affected more and more."

Klees blames environmental problems on local municipal councils. He wants environmental and resource guidelines to be followed.

"The problem with this province," says Spatafora, "is that not enough people are dealing with environmental problems." He refers to Oak Ridges as a water recharge area, where many rivers and waters originate. Ontarians should preserve the forests and kettle lakes, bring back environmental inspectors and stop the shipping of toxic waste from the United States to Canada, he says.

With a Jewish population of 7,500, an overwhelming proportion reside in Richmond Hill, according to Jay Brodbar, director of research for UJA Federation.

Spatafora and Klees stress the importance of fairness in private school funding. Klees warns that government-controlled institutions may face giving up their independence with long-term affects such as controlled agendas.

"I found that the Jewish community wants quality of life," Klees says, "which is directly related to the stability of our economy."

Moise believes his youth will be an asset. "I'm young, I'm out there. I see the changes and the affects that relate to the average person."

Steven Haylestrom is the candidate for the Green Party.

MPPs face off

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Ontario Election '99

TORONTO — The rejigging of provincial ridings means that in Eglinton-Lawrence, two high-profile MPPs are facing each other in this week's election.

John Parker, first elected as a Tory in 1995 in York East, squares off against Liberal Mike Colle, the MPP for Oakwood. The NDP candidate is Jay Waterman.

Eglinton-Lawrence has been carved out of several ridings. About one-third of it will consist of Oakwood, with the rest incorporating parts of Wilson Heights, Lawrence and St. Andrew-St. Patrick – meaning it has a sizeable Jewish population among the riding's 103,000 residents.

John Parker

The riding is bounded roughly by Yonge Street, Highway 401, the CN rail lines to the west and Eglinton Avenue. It includes the heavily Jewish Bathurst Street corridor between Chaplin Crescent and the 401, a large Orthodox population in the Bathurst/Lawrence area and many chassidic families in the Bathurst/Wilson neighborhood.

For Parker, 44, the election amounts to "a referendum on [Premier] Mike Harris."

A lawyer, Parker deviates somewhat from his leader by saying he completely supports the idea of public funding for private, religious-based schools.

"The province should be in the business of setting standards, to make the system accountable," Parker told The CJN. "Once standards are set, the door [to funding] should be open to any provider who meets them."

Jay Waterman

He adds that Harris has not closed the door to funding entirely. "I see an openness there. He hasn't rejected it, but the issue in this election is to produce the best [public] system possible."

When it comes to elder care, "the Jewish community is miles ahead of anyone else, including the government. We have a lot to learn from the Jewish community." The Harris government, he notes, has undertaken a "massive" restructuring of the health-care system, and has "invested" in long-term, home- and community-based care – all priorities in the Jewish community.

Mike Colle

The Tories have pledged to increase health care funding by 20 percent, "and we are committed to restructuring no matter how much resistance we encounter."

He points out that it was a Tory MPP, Ted Chudleigh, who introduced a bill last year that will mark Holocaust Memorial Day, Yom Hashoah every year in Ontario.

As a university student, Waterman, now 59, was active in the NDP's forerunner, the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation, and was at the party's founding convention.

He has served on several NDP policy committees and in 1990, he ran in the old Eglinton riding. Although he lost to Liberal Diane Poole, he polled 7,700 votes.

A former member of Holy Blossom Temple, he believes that the NDP's social democratic values "are most consistent with Jewish values."

Waterman, a lawyer with Legal Aid Ontario, agrees with leader Howard Hampton that public funding should not be extended to private schools.

"The need should be devoted to the public system," he says. "[Funding private schools] would leave the public system even more seriously underfunded than it is."

Waterman and his party believe that large-scale reinvestment in health care, education and housing can be accomplished with a plan to raise $1.5 billion by reversing the Tories' tax cut for the six percent of Ontarians who earn more than $80,000 a year.

He says provincial downloading of social housing onto municipalities should not be tolerated if cities cannot absorb costs.

If elected, the NDP plans to build 16,000 affordable housing units and 14,000 assisted units, he says.

Colle, 54, a former chair of the TTC who was elected to Queen's Park in 1995, says voters in the riding are nervous about health care and hospital closures. "I've never seen people so unsettled," he says, especially when it comes to Branson Hospital, where emergency hours have been scaled back and the number of doctors reduced.

Colle says Liberal leader Dalton McGuinty is the "most open" of the three leaders to funding for independent schools.

"I can't say I personally support full funding [for Jewish day schools], but I am willing to listen." He called Harris' rejection of funding during the leaders' debate "a cheap shot."

Many tenants in the riding are elderly, Colle notes, and cannot afford to move or see their units turned into condominiums. The Liberals, he says, believe provincial lands should be handed over to non-profit groups, at no charge, for long-term care facilities, low-rent housing or other facilities that would benefit those on fixed incomes.

Toronto girl wins Bible contest

MONTREAL — How many days and nights did the Great Flood last? Who was Abraham's wife? Why were Adam and Eve banished from the Garden of Eden?

Those are some of the easier questions that Jewish schoolchildren from several cities across Canada answered during the recent 1999 National Bible Contest.

Close to 140 elementary and high school students, all winners of regional contests held in Quebec, Ontario and western Canada, took part in the annual competition held over two days at Bialik High School and Congregation Beth Zion.

Participants often spend months preparing for the competition under the guidance of Bible coaches. To expect to finish well, students must master a tremendous amount of material and have an encyclopedic recall of biblical facts.

Many Jewish day and supplementary schools are officially associated with the contest, entering students in all levels. However, the national contest is open to any Jewish student, whether they go to a Jewish school or not. They may enter as independents.

That was the case for this year's top finisher, Batya Breslow, a Grade 9 student at Beth Jacob School in Toronto, an Orthodox girls' school. She earned the title of Kallat Chidon Hatanach of Canada and will represent this country at the International Bible Contest in Jerusalem next spring.

She competed in a category open to those in grades 9 to 13 in day schools.

Merav Fima, of Herzliah High School (Snowdon) in Montreal, earned the same title for Quebec and will also go to the world competion.

Coming second and third in the senior category were, respectively, Eliav Danzinger of Community Hebrew Academy and Joseph Aiken of Yeshivat Or Chaim, both of Toronto.

Winners in the grades 7-8 category were all from Toronto: first, Michael Kurin of United Synagogue Day School; second, Shalom Naumann of Eitz Chaim School (Patricia branch); and third, Leah Breslow of Eitz Chaim (Spring Farm branch).

In the grade 5-6 division, first place went to Ian Brasq of Associated Junior High, second to Hillel Nadler of Netivot Hatorah and third to Malki Feldman of Eitz Chaim (Viewmont branch), all of Toronto.

Daniel Bierstone, another independent entrant, a Grade 5 student at Toronto's Institute of Child Study, took top honors in the supplementary schools division. Others finishing best were: Adam Silver of Beth Tikvah School of Toronto, second; and, tied in third place, were Jacob Fox of the Downtown Jewish Community School in Toronto, Emily Moon and Ilana Hanes of Temple Israel School in Ottawa, and Jeffrey Heifetz, also of Beth Tikvah.

The supplementary students were in grades 5 to 7.

"The goal of the competition is to promote the study of Bible as an attractive and fun activity," said Lois Lieff, of the Jewish Education Council which organized the event, with the financial support of FEDERATION CJA.

"It also sparks cross-Canada friendships between like-minded Jewish students." This was the contest's 25th year.

In addition to the actual competition, students participated in a variety of activities. The younger grades visited the Biodome for a "biblical safari," and all students took in the Oasis in Space show at the Dow Planetarium.

The 90 out-of-towners, from Ottawa, Toronto, Winnipeg, Edmonton, Calgary, Vancouver and Victoria, were billeted with local families.

Last year's top Canadian qualifier, Carolyn Gehr, a Grade 11 student at the Snowdon Herzliah, recently came in seventh in this year's International Bible Competion in Israel in the world category which includes Israel.

She placed fourth in the Diaspora category, which included 50 countries.

To prepare, she studied 387 chapters of the Bible, devoting two hours a day to the task.

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

To casual observers, it is sometimes difficult to imagine how constituency work can get done when MPs (and senators) are busy jetting around the world.

Usually, such activity is restricted to times when the House is in recess. It seems that this year, "recess" is coming early and parliamentarians are off to all sorts of exotic climes.

To assess the value of these trips, we should first navigate between the various categories of travel. Many trips taken by federal politicians are a function of Canada's international obligations. The most active within this group would be the IPU or Inter-parliamentary Union. The Canadian delegation is currently headed by Sheila Finestone who recruits colleagues for particular IPU meetings depending on the IPU agenda at the time. Other organizations that fall into this category would be the parliamentary delegations to NATO and the Commonwealth.

These excursions are generally seen as useful – both in terms of MPs sharing and exchanging perspectives with colleagues around the world, as well as serving as an opportunity for our elected officials to broaden their horizons. A recent NATO delegation's sidebar visit to a Nazi death camp is a good case in point.

A second variety of travel is directly related to parliamentary committee work to advance the business of the committee. Typically, the foreign affairs committee might travel to a region of the world that is under consideration in connection with a piece of legislation or a committee report. These trips are almost always regarded as valuable in helping the parliamentarian better understand the issues .

A third category of travel, one which is held in much less esteem, is the Team Canada boondoggle. Ostensibly these trips are designed to blitz (tradewise, that is) specifically targeted regions and score commercial contracts for Canadian companies. Of course, everyone knows that the contracts announced during the trips were negotiated weeks in advance. An MP's participation on such ventures represents little more than a perk or "thank you" from the Prime Minister.

The trips most often criticized, however, are the "political junkets" paid for by third parties. Next week we will take a look at some of them – including ones sponsored by various Jewish communal agencies.

Immigrant skills development conference held

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The first ever immigrant to immigrant skills development conference, sponsored by Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS), was a useful and interesting exercise, says the social work team supervisor in the Toronto JIAS office.

"This conference (held May 15 and 16 at Winnipeg's Asper Jewish Community Campus) was all about immigrants helping immigrants," says Mila Voihanski.

"It was different in that there were no professionals leading workshops or making presentations. It was about the initiative of other immigrants. There was a lot of positive energy coming out of the workshops. We heard some wonderful ideas. The immigrants here felt supported and cared for."

Voihanski came to Canada 25 years ago from Lvov, by way of Israel. "I was intending to go to the United States," she recalls, "but a travel agent suggested it would be easier getting into the United States from Toronto. I fell in love with Toronto, married here and made my home and career here."

She has spent her entire working career in Toronto working for JIAS, first as a translator and then a case worker before assuming her present position.

One of the panelists, Naum Shteinbah, a development manager for the Qualico Group of companies, came from Moldova to Calgary nine years ago. He and his family were helped by the Jewish Family Service when they first came to the city.

His message to fellow immigrants was to "think new" rather than concentrate on past negative experiences. "It is a major adjustment adapting to a society that is not your own," he observes. "But the better you adapt, the better your chances of success."

Boris Kerdimun came to the conference from New York. He describes it as an exciting opportunity to bring people together to discuss common issues. "Conferences like this are still rare," he says. "I was especially happy for the chance to talk with new immigrants from Argentina and Brazil."

Originally from Moscow, Kerdimun has been living in New York for 20 years. For much of that time, he has been working for the New York Association for New Americans Inc. (NYANA), the largest immigrant and refugee resettlement agency in the United States. For the past seven years, he has been program director for NYANA's advisory committee for emigres program.

"We help professionals, mainly from the former Soviet Union, in their job search by linking them with American colleagues who help them find their way," he explains.

"We also serve as a [volunteer] clearing house for the Jewish community, promote Russian speaking Jews' involvement in their Jewish communities, and foster ties between Russian-speaking grassroots organizations and the larger American Jewish community."

Adaptation to a new culture is a life-long process, he notes. "I am still working to improve my English after 20 years," he says. "I will never reach the level of fluency that I enjoy in Russian, but I love the process. One of the most important things for the wider community to realize is that integration of immigrants is a two-way street. New immigrants enhance their communities with their own talents and skills."

In total, the conference attracted 70 immigrants ranging in age from 16 to 66, from coast to coast. The panels and seminars were designed to provide new Jewish immigrants to Canada with an opportunity to network with business contacts, mentors and fellow immigrants from across the country.

Michael Briks, JIAS national executive vice-president, reports that every one of the delegates had the cost of the trip and the conference paid for by their local communities.

"It is a gift to them from caring Jewish communities," Briks says.

"The trade-off is that we expect them to make serious contributions to their communities when they return."

Kesher fieldworker reaches out to Reform students

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When she was a sociology student at McMaster University, Lisa Isen became involved in Temple Anshe Sholom, Hamilton's Reform congregation, where she taught and worked as a youth group adviser.

Although she also served as co-president of the Jewish Students Association, her involvement in the temple filled a gap for her.

Since the fall, when Isen, 25, was hired jointly by Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto and the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism (CCRJ) as Kesher fieldworker, she has been helping to fill Reform students at Toronto campuses.

Janice Elster, who recently completed her second year in Women's Studies and Jewish Studies at the University of Toronto, says it was nice to participate in a Kesher Havdallah service with other Reform students.

"Being Reform...there are certain ways of doing services, certain songs you sing, certain camps you went to. It's very comfortable to join something when it's familiar."

Elster, who grew up as part of Vancouver's Temple Sholom, is also involved in the greater Jewish student community. She is the incoming vice-president of U of T's Jewish Students' Union (JSU) and has been involved in a number of pluralism initiatives, including this year's Unity Mission, bringing students of different denominations together.

Kesher fieldworker Lisa Isen, left, and student Janice Elster participated in a University of Toronto Purim party earlier this year. Elster is involved in both Kesher and U of T's Jewish Students' Union.

"I learned a lot, particularly about Conservative Judaism. That's what I knew the least about. I knew more about Orthodoxy from other students at the JSU. I learned there's no one way to be, even within each movement."

Kesher Toronto is the first of its kind in Canada, said Isen, whose position is part time. She is the only exclusively Kesher staff person to serve an individual campus in North America, to the best of her knowledge.

Kesher is "fairly new" in the United States. Here, the CCRJ formed its Reform on Campus committee three years ago.

Similarly, Koach and Kedma represent the campus arms of Conservative and Orthodox Judaism respectively.

Kesher activities in Toronto have included Friday night dinners and "Lunch and Learn" events. Future plans include a monthly minyan and outreach to campuses in a couple of nearby cities.

This year there was a "solid core" of about 15 Kesher students, with new people showing up at various programs, Isen said.

Despite an involvement with the Reform movement going back to her youth group days at Temple Emanu-El, Isen said that this year she's learned "a lot more what it really means to be a Reform Jew, and I'm learning a lot more about Judaism as a whole."

For Isen, it was important to bring a Reform perspective to the pluralistic programs.

"Reform students have needs as well. They feel as uncomfortable sitting segregated as Orthodox students feel sitting together."

Volunteers sought for excavation

TORONTO — Throughout the millennia, readers of the Bible have been inspired by the story of David and Goliath.

Thanks to a new co-operative venture between the faculty of arts and the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University, and the Martin (Szusz) Department of Land of Israel Studies at Bar-Ilan University, Canadian students can receive university credit while taking part in recovering the world of the famed biblical figures. Other volunteers are also welcome.

Next month, a joint team from the two universities will resume the excavation of Tell es-Safi, between Ashkelon and Beth Shemesh. The site is widely believed to be the location of the Philistine city of Gath, Goliath's hometown.

In return for their labor, volunteers receive on-site training, take field trips to other sites of interest, and play an essential role in the recovery of the Holy Land's past.

Foreign volunteers have been a mainstay of Israeli archeology ever since the late Yigael Yadin attracted people from all over the world to dig at Masada. Many are bitten by the archeology bug and return year after year to connect with their spiritual roots.

In 1966, a team of archeologists led by Dr. Aren Maeir of Bar-Ilan University initiated a long term scientific investigation at Tell es-Safi.

Navy officials say chance of raising Dakar is slight

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Top navy officials concluded last weekend that chances are slight of retrieving the Dakar submarine from its resting place on the seabed in the Mediterranean, 2,900 meters below sea level.

The decision was made in a meeting held by the Israel Navy's commanding officer, Admiral Alex Tal. The families of the 69 men who went down with the Dakar are split over whether or not the submarine should be raised.

The submarine, which disappeared on Jan. 24, 1968, on its return journey to Israel after it was refurbished in Portsmouth, England, was positively identified last week.

Speaking to the families at a naval base in Haifa last weekend, Tal said the Israel Navy does not currently have the technological ability to recover the sunken craft.

Defence Minister Moshe Arens said that if the technology becomes available, the considerable expense involved would not stand in the way of recovery.

IDF Chief of Staff Lt. Gen. Shaul Mofaz briefed the cabinet on the discovery of the Dakar. He said the IDF allocated NIS 10 million to the search over the last year, bringing the total amount spent on the search since 1968 to NIS 25 million.

Brig.-Gen. (Res.) Gideon Raz, who headed the search team, said yesterday that "anything is possible, it depends on money and time.

"The Americans are the only ones who tried to do anything like this, when they wanted to recover a Soviet nuclear submarine. But they were prepared to invest any effort and even built a special submarine for the task."

He noted that the American effort was only partly successful and only two-thirds of the Soviet submarine was recovered.

Experts believe that even if is possible to reach the submarine, it is doubtful whether any human remains are still inside. While IDF officials have not said so explicitly, it is very unlikely that the Dakar will be retrieved from the sea in the next several years.

Submarine

Navy officials pointed out yesterday that the accepted tradition among the navies of the world is to hold annual memorial ceremonies near the location where a ship has sunk, rather than to retrieve the remains of sailors.

The three senior naval reserve officers who made a positive identification of the Dakar on the bottom of the Mediterranean, between Crete and Cyprus returned to Israel last weekend.

Raz and his two colleagues, reserve colonels Michael Kesari and Doron Amir, attended the meeting called by Tal to discuss the discovery and the navy's next moves.

The submarine was broken into three large pieces, with smaller pieces scattered in a 200-meter radius around the main part. The location and shape of the pieces support the theory that the submarine sunk as a result of mechanical failure and/or human error and was not destroyed deliberately.

Some members of the search crew believe the vessel may have been hit by a freighter or another vessel, a possibility that will be investigated.

Mike Eldar, a retired navy captain who wrote a book on the Dakar, said that such a collision would probably have been reported by officers on the other vessel and, even if kept out of official logs, would have been made public over the years.

The head of the Abu Kabir Institute of Forensic Medicine, Prof. Yehuda Hiss, told Ha'aretz that the navy had asked him for information on ways to identify corpses in the ocean.

Hiss said he requested information on the subject from the U.S. Navy, which has the most current information on the subject. The sea might have preserved the bodies, he said.

But the head of the Institute of Naval Studies, Yuval Cohen, said that it is doubtful that the bones of the missing sailors would have survived in the deep waters.

On his way to the spot 500 kilometers from Israel's coast where the Dakar was found, Amir made a list of five items that would provide positive identification of the sunken submarine.

Any one of them would have been enough, and the relatively short filming mission of the underwater robot revealed four of the identifying characteristics that enabled the search team members to say conclusively, "This is it."

The naval command asked Raz to board a missile boat at Haifa within two hours, without indicating the nature of the mission.

Only after he boarded the ship was Raz told that the Dakar had been located southwest of Crete, but that no positive identification had been made.

Raz made the list of the five unique features at that time. The features were mainly changes made by the British to the submarine to refit it to Israel Navy specifications, and were unique to the Dakar and its sister sub, the Leviathan.

Berlin's Jewish Museum short of exhibit 'stuff'

By TOBY AXELROD
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BERLIN — The walls of the new Jewish Museum here are bare, except for shard-like windows that let in slashes of light.

From the top floor, it seems the city's pre- and postwar buildings unfold outward like petals around this silvery, zigzag heart.

Currently, it is a museum without exhibits, but Michael Cullen hopes to change that soon.

As coordinator of research, Cullen is appealing to the public for "stuff" for the first exhibit, which is scheduled to open in October 2000.

An ad campaign is due to start in June in German Jewish publications and major newspapers here, and in Israel, the United States and Britain.

Cullen wants material pouring in from all places where there are people with German roots.

"We are looking for everything and everybody and everywhere we can," says Cullen. He was born in New York in 1939, the son of Jewish immigrants from eastern Europe. He has lived in Berlin since 1967.

Cullen wants people to search their attics and basements for documents, photos, paintings, you name it – photocopies are acceptable. If something is valuable, like a painting, the museum will consider purchasing it.

Cullen hopes to receive items related to the 1848 revolution in Germany, which was one in a wave of democratic uprisings across Europe at the time.

He also wants items on Jewish life in the countryside and cities. He's also interested in assimilation and conversion, and Jewish cultural life.

"Religious life is only one facet of Jewish life in Germany," says Cullen.

How will he convince people to part with such material?

"Everything we get can be used to help educate," Cullen says. "People should remember that there are stories behind these things that we should know."

The first exhibit will focus on German Jewish life from 1848 to 1919. But Cullen hopes to receive items from all periods of history.

Cullen said 500,000 visitors are expected each year at the museum once exhibitions open.

Already, tens of thousands have visited the celebrated building, designed by Polish Israeli architect Daniel Libeskind, since it opened in February for weekend tours.

Some have called the building a sculpture in itself. Representing a broken Star of David, the museum is covered in gray zinc panels and is pierced by jagged windows.

It took six years to build the museum, and the road to its opening has been rocky, with fighting over who should direct it and what it should contain.

The city government fired the previous director, Israeli curator Amon Barzel, reportedly because of his universal and contemporary approach to Jewish art and history.

After former U.S. Treasury Secretary Michael Blumenthal was hired as a replacement, he won administrative autonomy for the museum. He and assistant director Tom Freudenheim – both come from families who escaped Nazi Germany – are free to make decisions about exhibits, rather than work under the thumb of the Berlin city museum.

The museum's mandate has likewise changed.

Instead of focusing on the history of Jews in Berlin, it will cover German Jewish history from Roman times to the present.

Blumenthal has made it clear that although the Holocaust will be one theme, exhibitions will also focus on the vibrancy of Jewish life and culture.

Chief adviser to the museum is Shaike Weinberg, 80, an Israeli museum designer. He was responsible for the design of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, in addition to several Israeli museums.

The estimated operating costs of the Berlin museum will be about $11 million.

To contact the museum search team, write Michael Cullen, Jewish Museum Berlin, Lindenstrasse 9-14, Berlin 10969, or e-mail Recherechen@jmberlin.de.

Germany elects president

By TOBY AXELROD
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BERLIN — Johannes Rau has been elected Germany's eighth postwar president in elections that coincided with the 50th anniversary of West Germany's constitution.

In his acceptance speech, he said he saw it as his "personal duty from this day on, to be president for all Germans and a voice for all those who live and work here without a German passport."

Rau promised to uphold the values of not only Germans, but of "humanity."

"I will never be a nationalist, but definitely a patriot," Rau said. "A patriot is someone who loves his fatherland, but a nationalist is someone who hates the homelands of others."

Rau, 68, a member of Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder's Social Democratic party, will replace the Christian Democratic Union party's incumbent, Roman Herzog, on July 1.

Herzog, 65, who in his five-year term earned the respect of Jewish organizations worldwide, this month received a humanitarian award from the Anti-Defamation League in New York for fighting bigotry, xenophobia and anti-Semitism in Germany.

Rau also has demonstrated support for Jewish causes. Though the position of president is largely ceremonial, it carries moral weight, and has been described as the voice of Germany's conscience.

Barak's new challenges

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Ehud Barak, Israel's prime minister-elect, carries a heavy burden. In last month's election, he not only won a victory over a discredited leader, but also a mandate to break the deadlock in the peace process and to diffuse ethnic and religious tensions in Israel itself. Barak, therefore, is under tremendous pressure to perform.

Before he can get down to the business at hand, he must form a coalition government. Although he handily defeated Benjamin Netanyahu, the Likud incumbent, his One Israel movement lost one-fifth of its Knesset seats.

Barak, in line with former prime minister Shimon Peres' philosophy, hopes to form a centrist national unity government with such ideologically diverse partners as the Likud, the National Religious Party and Meretz. He is convinced, rightly or wrongly, that purely left-wing and right-wing governments deepen divisions in a politically, ethnically and religiously fragmented country like Israel.

A classic consensus builder, Barak is neither a dove nor a hawk, but a pragmatist. As a minister in Yitzhak Rabin's government, he raised eyebrows by abstaining on the September 1995 Oslo 2 agreement. He argued that its security provisions were flawed, but supported its broad objectives.

Having hammered away at the election campaign theme that Israel was "stuck," Barak wants to implement the 1998 Wye memorandum and to deal with the panoply of final status issues: borders, settlements, water rights. But Barak will proceed with caution.

Like Netanyahu, Barak will insist that the Palestinians rein in terrorism and squelch incitement. And while he would prefer a confederation between the Palestinian Authority and Jordan, Barak is not opposed to a sovereign demilitarized Palestinian state, or "physical separation" from the Palestinians. Barak lives by the credo that "high fences make good neighbors."

The question, of course, is how much land Barak is willing to cede. Netanyahu, at a maximum, was probably prepared to withdraw from 60 percent of the West Bank. Barak may be ready to relinquish as much as 85 percent, on condition Israel maintains control of major settlement clusters and no Arab armies are stationed west of the Jordan River, Israel's "security" border. It sounds a lot like the Allon Plan.

As for Jerusalem, Barak is of the view that it must remain undivided under Israel's administration. However, he believes that Har Choma's development should be deferred until final status negotiations (which are far behind schedule). He thinks that the Jerusalem corridor should be widened in Israel's favor, but has made no public comments regarding the status of Orient House, the PLO's headquarters in eastern Jerusalem, or the possibility of designating Abu Dis as the capital of a future Palestinian state.

Barak has promised to pull Israeli troops out of southern Lebanon within a year, but in the context of an accord with Syria. Barak, unlike Netanyahu, will agree to resume bilateral talks with Syria at the point they broke off in 1996. But both sides have yet to determine where they stopped. In accordance with Rabin's policy, he has stated that the depth of a withdrawal from the Golan Heights will be linked to the degree of peace and normalization.

Judging by the election results, a majority of Israelis are ready to part with the Golan. Settlers on the Golan voted for Barak by a margin of 57 to 41. And significantly, the Third Way party, whose single-issue platform turned on the importance of keeping the Golan, lost all four of its Knesset seats.

Barak, a strong believer in the unity of the Jewish people, will not support legislation which will sow disunity and acrimony. In January, he voted against a bill barring non-Orthodox Jews from serving on local religious councils. And, in the interests of fairness, he still intends to go ahead with legislation to abolish haredi draft exemptions.

Clearly, Barak faces awesome challenges.

The Week in Israel

May 24

• Prime Minister-elect Ehud Barak began presenting potential coalition partners with a 10-point plan outlining his policy goals. The plan rules out an Israeli withdrawal from all of the West Bank and declares that Israel will retain control over all of Jerusalem.

May 25

• A 30-year-old Jerusalem mother gave birth to a set of quadruplets last week without undergoing fertility treatments. The odds of such an event occurring are less than one in 512,000. Doctors had suggested that the Jewish woman, who already has six children, undergo embryonic reduction, but she refused for religious reasons.

• An earthquake measuring 5.2 on the Richter scale shook parts of Israel but caused no damage or injuries. The tremor's epicentre was located near Cyprus.

May 26

• The Supreme Court ordered the Interior Ministry to explain its policy of cancelling the citizenship of Israel Arab women who had married Palestinians and moved to the West Bank. Court president Aharon Barak called the policy "outrageous discrimination." Outgoing Interior Minister Eli Suissa said that policy had been halted six years ago.

May 27

• Outgoing Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu resigned his Knesset seat during a meeting of the Likud Party's central committee. However, he left the door open to a possible return to politics some day. "Under no circumstances am I retiring from the battle for my country," he said. The committee confirmed outgoing Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon as its acting head.

May 28

• In an attempt to create a continuous swath of Israeli territory east of Jerusalem, Defence Minister Moshe Arens approved a master plan connecting Ma'aleh Adumim with Jerusalem. The plan increases the municipal territory of Ma'aleh Adumim by 10,000 dunams (2,500 acres.)

Blood test used to help detect heart trouble

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One of the latest advances in medicine is the development of a blood test indicating whether or not an individual has a genetic predisposition to heart trouble.

Such knowledge will enable physicians to take action to reduce the risks of heart disease.

"This will be a valuable spinoff from the human genome project," said Dr. John Floras, referring to an international project on genetics. Floras, head of cardiology at Mount Sinai Hospital (MSH), was addressing an audience of 300 at the final forum in the Mount Sinai Healthy Living Series, held recently at the Leah Posluns Theatre.

Not enough attention is being paid to the socio-economic status of those suffering from heart attacks and heart failure, Floras noted. Those who are well off tend to get faster service than those with lower incomes, he said.

He also showed a slide of a map of Ontario which indicated that people in areas away from populated centres have to wait longer for medical or hospital services.

On prevention and cutting risks, Dr. Floras stressed the importance of maintaining the right weight. He noted that being 10 pounds overweight for 10 years can lead to the loss of a year of life.

During the question period, he said vitamins C and E have generated great enthusiasm on the part of those who believe they cut the risk of heart attacks, "but this has not translated into positive results. If I am asked, I do not recommend them to my patients."

He had the same view of selenium, stating there was just anecdotal evidence to support its effectiveness.

"We are very excited about the study we are doing on echo cardiography as a means of diagnosing coronary disease," said Dr. Zion Sasson, a staff cardiologist at MSH. The hospital has the largest laboratory volume of such tests in the province.

Dr. Allan Gordon, MSH staff neurologist, said that persons who believe they are suffering from a stroke, or who suspect one is in the offing, should get to a hospital as quickly as possible. Signs of a stroke include temporary numbness in a part of the body, temporary blurring of vision and severe drowsiness, Gordon noted.

Strokes are the leading cause of disability in Canada, he said.

Of t-PA (activase), a drug which helps stroke victims, Gordon said: "It is not the godsend we hoped it would be. Only one of 10 patients will benefit. But there are new drugs coming."

Activase has just been approved in Canada, he said, but one of its drawbacks is that it has to be administered in a hospital within three hours of the onset of a stroke

Heart disease is just as important to women as it is to men, said Janet Durbin, of Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC), in thanking the speakers. "It used to be that women came to these meetings to help look after their men, but now they are coming for themselves."

Co-sponsors of the forum were the Jewish Women's Federation, the BJC and the National Council of Jewish Women.

Dr. Laura explains love

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

Everyone knows that parents love their children. It's part of their job. Many children, though, find this hard to understand.

After all, when kids get angry at someone, they are sure that they don't love that person at all. And grown-ups have so many more people to love.

Laura Schlessinger understands that. She is a marriage and family therapist, so she knows how families work. Also, she has a radio talk show, and lots of people call in and tell her about their problems.

Along with Martha Lambert, a children's book and video writer, she has written a very good book that talks about love between a mother and her child, called Why Do You Love Me? (HarperCollins, 1999).

Sammy's mother has just finished reading him a bedtime story. She kisses him good night and tells him that she loves him.

Sammy is worried, and asked her why she loves him. Mother asks him why he thinks she does. He thinks of all kinds of reasons. Maybe it's because he is so good at sports, or because he picked up his toys, or because he is kind to other people.

Then he worries about whether she stops loving him if he does something wrong, like being rude to her, or hitting someone, or crayoning on the wall.

What do you think your mother or father would say? Well, Sammy's mother tells him that she loves him whatever he does – or doesn't do. That is because he is "the one and only Sammy there will ever be in the whole world – and you're mine."

You will enjoy the colorful pictures Daniel McFeeley has drawn for Why Do You Love Me? In one, Sammy shows his mother that he has picked up all his toys, but he has stuffed them behind his door. And he certainly looks guilty when he is drawing pictures on the wall.

Schlessinger plans to write a series of books about things that children think about, and that they can discuss with their parents.

Toronto author's children's book is entertaining and educational

By ERIC STEIN
Special to The CJN

In The Secret of Gabi's Dresser (Second Story Press), a new children's book, parents and educators will find an indisposable resource for the challenging task of teaching kids about the Holocaust.

In her debut book, Toronto author Kathy Kacer, balances the best of good writing with sophisticated storytelling and an acute sensitivity to her targeted audience. The result is an insightful, educational, and deeply moving work of historical fiction, guaranteed to impact readers of all ages.

The tale begins in the present, with the grandchildren of Gabi playing hide-and-seek in their "Babichka's" house. Asked by the children if she played hide-and-seek as a young girl, Gabi shifts into storytelling mode, transporting the children and the reader to Czechoslovakia, circa 1940.

Gabi sketches her happy life as an innocent young girl growing up on a farm surrounded by mountains and beautiful countryside. She lives in a small village populated by both Jews and gentiles, who for the most part, enjoy harmonious relations.

That is, until the spectre of war and Nazism creeps closer to their idyllic community. From there, a familiar story unfolds: Jews are targeted for harassment and violence, they are prohibited from practicing their professions, they are required to wear identifying yellow stars, and are made subject to an increasing number of restrictive "Jewish Laws."

Conditions continue to deteriorate over subsequent years, leading to a tension-filled climax.

In April 1943, a squad of Slovak soldiers comes to take Gabi to a work camp. Miraculously, Gabi escapes capture by hiding in the family's dresser, normally reserved for china, silverware and keepsakes. Though terrified in the small, dark confines of the dresser, Gabi is calmed and quieted when she is overtaken by the presence of her late father.

Soon after this ordeal, Gabi and her mother leave their home, and spend the duration of the war hiding in a hayloft in the mountains. When they return two years later, they find their house inhabited by a Czech family. Without a home, they emigrate to Palestine, and later, America. They take very few of their possessions with them, but the one and only piece of furniture they take is the dresser.

It is both a tragic and triumphant story, made all the more compelling because it is based on a real occurrence. Kacer is the daughter of Gabi, who true to the story, eluded capture by Slovak soldiers by hiding in the family dresser. Family lore holds that while the soldiers searched for Gabi, her mother clutched the key to the dresser so tightly that her palm bled.

Today, the very dresser that inspired the story sits in Kacer's living room, a reminder of her mother's travail and miraculous survival.

Tackling a decidedly adult subject in a story aimed at children could have proven problematic, but Kacer handles this delicate task with skill. Her prose is artfully unpretentious, but nonetheless challenging for young audiences. Her sharp sense of narrative development leads the story in a coherent arc toward its dramatic climax.

She succeeds in revealing a great deal about the nature of prejudice, and her book will help young people to not only understand the dangers of ethnic discrimination, but to sympathize with its victims.

Filled with complex, well-crafted characters and rendered with historical accuracy, the story holds unusual depth for a children's book. It should prove as compelling and accessible for older readers as for its targeted audience.

Kacer is particularly effective in delving subtly into some of the central issues of Holocaust study. A recurring theme is the false sense of security that keeps Jews from recognizing that the worst is, in fact, possible. Though Gabi and her mother survive, their story is exceptional. The vast majority of European Jews realized too late that remaining brave and obeying the restrictive Jewish Laws would not be enough to avert their horrible fate.

Kacer is also effective in portraying the acquiescence of the gentiles to the destruction of the Jews. This is poignantly illustrated by Nina, Gabi's gentile friend who deserts Gabi as anti-Semitism escalates. Once friends and neighbors of the Jews, the gentiles of Gabi's village stand idly by as the Jews are persecuted. Concerned more for their own well-being than for the great injustice occurring before their eyes, their complicity allowed the Holocaust to occur.

Today, as we witness a new holocaust in the Balkans, The Secret of Gabi's Dresser strikes an ominous note, reminding us of the peril we face in failing to remain vigilant on behalf of others, and by clinging to a dangerous form of complacency that deceives us into believing "it could never happen here."

Revealing the human face of the Holocaust, and delving subtly into many of the central issues in Holocaust study, The Secret of Gabi's Dresser is a thought-provoking, moving, and exciting tale. Kacer (who has been nominated by the National Magazine Awards Foundation for an article she wrote based on the story) will have readers, young and old alike, turning the pages eagerly, unable to put down this gripping story until its completion.

Shylock and anti-Semitism

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

No Shakespeare play has generated as much controversy in the post-Holocaust era as The Merchant of Venice.

Although he's only in five scenes – less than a third of the play – Shakespeare's Jewish villain Shylock is synonymous with the anti-Semitic stereotype prevalent in Europe for centuries.

Filmmaker Pierre Lasry uses Shylock and the various productions of The Merchant of Venice throughout history, to examine anti-Semitism through the ages in the National Film Board's Shylock, airing June 9 at 9 p.m. on Bravo.

Was Shakespeare an anti-Semite or was he merely reflecting popular xenophobic sentiment prevalent in Elizabethan England? (There were few Jews in England at the time.)

Did the character of Shylock reflect people's view of moneylenders? (Shakespeare's father John was a moneylender.) Was Shylock a victim of ostracization by the mainstream or a villain, heartlessly seeking revenge? Was he a bad Jew who wanted to kill a good Christian?

These are just a few of the questions addressed by many leading Shakespearean directors and actors in this one-hour documentary. The film also includes footage of well-known actors in the role of Shylock, among them, Laurence Olivier, Dustin Hoffman and an unfinished version by Orson Welles.

There are many fascinating insights into this play. One director compared it to a staging of the Passion Play, with Bassanio – his arms out in crucifixion style – waiting for Shylock to extract his pound of flesh.

The Nazis staged a version of The Merchant of Venice in Vienna, on the day Austria became officially Judenrein.

The play has gone through many directorial revisions in its production history. Shylock, originally portrayed as a villainous buffoon, was given more tragic aspects during the Romantic period.

Perhaps most interesting is seeing how contemporary directors try to deal with the controversy today.

One Jewish director, Tibor Egervari, decided to stage the play in a concentration camp with Shylock played by an SS officer who turns into the traditional stereotype Jew during the trial. The concentration camp inmates kill Shylock, thus killing both the SS officer and the anti-Semitic stereotype.

There are many other interesting theories, debates and interpretations presented in this documentary, which should appeal to both Shakespeare enthusiasts and history buffs.

Henry Irving as Shylock in 1879 production.

Not ready to give up his day job

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Daryl Marks, 38, is an actor who says his day job, managing a shoe store, comes first.

Though his passion for acting goes back to when he was a boy in England, Marks says he would never be able to make a living for his family if he gave up a full-time job for the stage.

"I'm in shoe business in the daytime and show business at night," he said. All his day jobs have been in selling shoes.

Marks has been taking lead roles in community theatre – once he stepped in when another actor begged off with only three weeks to opening night – and doesn't get paid.

He is being paid for playing the philandering husband four times a week in the Pickering Herongate dinner theatre show Out on a Limb, but even this payment for a seven-week run would not keep the wolf from the door.

He won a Thea award for his role as Charlie in Larry Shue's The Foreigner for Markham Little Theatre, a role he reprised three months later with East Side Players.

Marks was the quadraplegic lead in Whose Life Is It Anyway, a role played by Richard Dreyfus in the movie, for Weston Little Theatre, and was the male lead in A.R. Gurney's Love Letters for Theatre Durham in Pickering.

"If I did get a role in one of the big theatres, I'd have to give up my day job, and I couldn't live on the income from four or five plays. This is a tough business, and it's not what you know but who you know."

A Willowdale resident born in Liverpool, Marks is married to Catherine, who has two children, Madison, 12 and Jessica, 10, from a previous marriage. His parents, Howard and Loretta, live in Don Mills.

Eye on Arts

THEY'RE BACK!

Food critics Marty and Avrum are two good eggs that always turn up sunny-side up.

Although one Toronto station recently canned their weekly radio show after over three years, the duo's food talk was just too fresh to be kept on the shelf for long. Hence their recent reappearance on Toronto radio station CFRB 1010, each Saturday evening from 7 to 8 p.m.

Marty Galin and Avrum Rosensweig established themselves as devoted food aficionados years ago, starting with a magazine column and articles, then a telephone hotline for restaurant reviews, then lines of fresh-baked kosher pretzels, ice cream sorbet and other products.

Along with their often witty repartee, their new cooking show, called Marty and Avrum The Food Guys, features interviews with food experts and chefs, winery connoisseurs, restaurant owners and others.

You might also hear them on air at other times, kibitzing their way through commercials for products such as Broil King barbecues.

Duo at McMichael: The musical ensemble Duo, consisting of Margot Rydall on flute and Ivan Zilman on guitar, present a recital of an eclectic mix of classical and jazz selections, at the McMichael Gallery on Islington Ave. in Kleinburg. June 6, 1:30 p.m.

Lenka in Concert: Yiddish singer and songwriter Lenka Lichtenberg performs a concert featuring new Jewish music and traditional Yiddish treasures, many from her latest album, Deep Inside. Ford Centre Studio Theatre, June 16, 8 p.m. $10. 870-8000.

Ve'Ahavta Benefit: Ve'Ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee, is hosting Songs Under the Stars, a tribute to previously unsung acts of courage by numerous honorees. They include Joseph Enyew, who rescued some 1,500 Ethiopian Jews, and Shyrna Gilbert, co-founder of the Rwanda Children's Fund to aid orphans.

Performers include Michael Burgess, Amy Sky, Liberty Silver, Billy Newton-Davis and Karen Wierzba; the musical director is Jack Lenz.

A kosher dinner will be served under an open-air canopy on the grounds of Southbrook Farms, 1061 Major Mackenzie Drive. Tuesday, June 8, 6:30 p.m. 487-5472.

Literary Notes: The Book of Ruth, which we read each year at Shavuot, is considered a great work of literature. What famous late 19th-century novel used that ancient Hebrew megillah as a primary source?

Answer: Thomas Hardy apparently relied enormously on the story of Ruth when devising the plot and characterizations for his celebrated novel Tess of the D'Urbervilles. Ruth, a Moabite and the widow of an Israelite, remains steadfastly loyal to the God of Israel; instead of returning to the idols of Moab, she returns with her mother-in-law to Judea, where she gleans the fields in poverty.

Eventually she seeks and attains redemption from a wealthy cousin named Boaz, who recognizes her spiritual purity and marries her; their son, Oved, is the grandfather of the future King David.

In Hardy's ironic recasting of the tale, Tess's impoverished father discovers a wealthy relative, Alex D'Urberville, and Tess reluctantly appeals to him to help her family. But Alex rapes and impregnates her, and Tess gleans the fields an unwed mother; eventually the baby dies.

The idealism and optimism of the original story is transformed by Hardy so that it becomes a bitter tale of twisted fate involving the downfall of an innocent maiden.

None of the three men closest to Tess are strong enough morally to redeem her. At book's end she is a fugitive from justice. Finally, she is apprehended at the time-worn monument of Stonehenge. By utilizing Stonehenge, is Hardy making a comment on the ancient nature of the story?

Credit card fraud high in Israel

Ha'aretz Daily Newsaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Credit-card users have said they were charged for non-existent purchases in more than 50 percent of all Internet shopping transactions in Israel, according to Visa-Israel Credit Cards.

This compares to about seven percent in the U.S., according to data from the American Consumer Council.

A Visa-ICC spokeswoman said there is still very little Internet commerce here. But there are several thousand fraud complaints a year - though in most cases, she said, the amount which must be refunded is small.

Frequently, she added, it is difficult to locate the business responsible, so the company must absorb the losses.

Isracard said it tries to discourage its customers from Internet transactions, and will continue to do so until decent protection programs start being used.

One that looks promising, called SET, is currently in the experimental stage, the company said.

Book designed to protect us from evils of capitalism

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

As North American companies turn leaner and meaner in their bid to increase profits and compete globally, white-collar workers are feeling the effects.

Downsizing, mergers and redefinition of roles have made corporations more soulless and ruthless, values normally not associated with mainstream community norms.

"This is capitalism at its most Darwinian and unvarnished form," said Barbara Moses, a career counsellor, consultant and columnist for The Globe and Mail who has just written a book about this churning instability.

The Good News About Careers (Stoddart), she explained in an interview, is not a Pollyannaish tract, but a primer designed to protect Canadians from "the vagaries and nasty side of contemporary capitalism."

The book – her third in a series since 1982 – will, she hopes, help readers adapt to and thrive in the new environment.

"You are not a mere cog in the machinery. You can fight back. You have choices. You're disposable, but you have alternatives."

Moses, who holds post-graduate degrees in social psychology and applied psychology from McGill University and the London School of Economics, said that employees with marketable knowledge and skills can survive and prosper in the new corporate culture.

"You can be fired, but you can "fire" them. What I'm saying is this: Understand these changes and use them to your advantage."

Moses, the president of BBM Human Resource Consultants, based in Toronto, said that the new world of work calls for a fresh approach to careers – an approach she calls "career activism."

Career activists are thoughtful, vigilant, occasionally cocky and perhaps somewhat paranoid.

"They define themselves independently from their organization and take charge of their own career choices."

Moses, whose clients have included Levi Strauss and Four Seasons Regent Hotels, argues that the workplace has changed.

"The continuity and predictability of the workplace no longer exists. That's not good, but that's the way it is."

Workers who value autonomy, spontaneity and freedom revel in the new employer-employee relationship. But those who are accustomed to security and structure find is unsettling and wrenching. In general, workers past the age of 45 bemoan the passing of the old order.

"But the relationship was one-sided, while the price of corporate success was conformity and a permanent state of dependence."

Today, however, neither side is beholden to the other. "They both understand that the relationship is based on mutual exchange. If one word can be used to characterize the new career, it is self-reliance. You believe in your own competence, and this allows you to deal with the uncertainties associated with today's working world. Your security comes from within."

Barbara Moses

From a strictly personal point of view, Moses, an ex-Montrealer in her late 40s, is more comfortable with the new ways. "To me, it's great."

Yet, lest she be misunderstood, Moses said that she is no apostle of the survival of the fittest ethos corporations have embraced.

"I'm not a poster girl for these changes," said Moses, who, politically speaking, leans to the left. "If you read the book, you will find there is nothing apologetic about big business."

Having issued this disclaimer, she reiterated her thesis that workers owe it to themselves to be prepared for the new world of work.

In the old benevolent corporation, workers who did what was required of them were provided with job security, benefits and developmental experiences.

In the late 1990s workplace, she writes in The Good News About Careers, everything is in constant flux, from the contents of your work to where you work and how.

"The result is more uncertainty, but also more freedom to take on new roles, whether as a full-time employee, independent contractor or small business owner."

Nowadays, she said, there is a widespread expectation that you can "reconfigure" yourself throughout your career.

Moses, whose previous books were Career Intelligence and Career Planning Workbook, does not believe that extroverts have a natural advantage over introverts.

"Much of work is relationship-driven and, therefore, extroverts will be more successful"

On the other hand, she cautioned, recent technological developments, notably the personal computer and the Internet, favor introverts.

"You should," she advised, "seek out environments which play to your strengths."

How, she was asked, do you sell yourself at a job interview?

"You have to communicate very quickly how you can add value to a company, but drowning an interviewer with irrelevant information is ineffective."

By her estimation, the qualities employers seek are flexibility, the ability to work within groups and alone and to hit the ground running, an understanding of broader social and business trends, and finally, an aptitude for changing direction in mid-course and communicating compellingly and graphically.

Turning to a related topic, Moses suggested that modern corporations are shucking off religious and ethnic prejudice.

"Twenty years ago, I felt a slight discomfort, in part because I am Jewish. I don't see that as much today, and clients tell me that too, though I'm sure that there are areas in this country where being Jewish poses a problem."

A 1971 McGill graduate, Moses was born in the leafy Montreal suburb of Hampstead. Her father, Nat, was the proprietor of a bridal veil business. Her mother, Sylvia, was a housewife until her husband's death forced her to go to work. Moses' sister, Susan, is a librarian in Toronto

Moses, a passionate gardener, is married to Andrew Weiner, a science fiction author and former business writer who runs the day-to-day affairs of BBM Human Resource Consultants.

They have one child, Nathaniel, to whom she partially dedicates The Good News About Careers. Moses is concerned that parents are not properly "career proofing" their children for an increasingly uncertain future. "It's a serious problem in Canada today," she said. "Parents are so busy that they are not spending enough time with their children. As a result, kids are not getting the support and the nurturing they require."

Having looked long and hard at the problem, she plans to write a book about this benignly neglected topic.

"Stormin' Norman" — The Fan's real life Leaf fan

Hammerhead alert! Rumack rules late night talk radio

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Make no mistake about it. Norm Rumack is sport radio's late night vampire, Syracuse University's favorite son, Wendel Clark's biggest booster and an opinionated loudmouth who keeps people listening long after they should have tucked themselves into bed for a good night's sleep.

Although he's the creator of Hammerhead Alerts, the on-air narishkeit that greets the most inane of callers, Rumack in real life is Hammerheadity's opposite. He's a voracious reader of newspapers, an experienced TV and radio producer, a walking encyclopedia of sports trivia and a student of the broadcasting business who knows that to be successful you've got to develop name recognition.

Ergo, "Stormin' Norman" (a holdover from his Camp Winnebago days) and the numerous other personas he slips into while working The Fan's graveyard shift, 11 p.m. to 3 a.m. Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays, as well as weekend days.

It's a grueling schedule that Rumack is willing to endure for the prestige of working on a sports radio station in a major market. A die-hard Maple Leaf fan practically from childbirth, Rumack is in the enviable position (as long as you don't consider the hours) of being able to make a living shmoozing about sports.

It wasn't always so. At one time, Rumack struggled to break into the broadcasting business, working at odd jobs and sometimes supplementing his income teaching aerobics. But he always kept his eye on the prize, hoping to land a job in the medium he loves.

His infatuation with radio goes back to the mid-1960s, when he was growing up in Bathurst Manor. At nine, he recalls, he was already a "radio junkie" who fell asleep listening to CHUM radio DJs like Brian Skinner and Jungle Jay Nelson.

Rumack's favorite personality – his "hero" – was Jack Armstrong. "He'd speak at 70 m.p.h. in a falsetto voice and was so different than anybody else. I kept a tape of him on the air," Rumack said.

Back then, AM was top 40 oriented, but Rumack loved talk radio. "I knew then that I wanted to work in front of the microphone."

As a kid, he attended Associated Hebrew Schools, USDS, Bathurst Heights and graduated from Forest Hills Collegiate. His parents, Murray and Sylvia, helped found Beth Emeth Synagogue.

Norm studied history at York University, graduating in 1978. He worked in an automotive warehouse for a year until he realized "I didn't want to work at a job that was not mentally stimulating."

He enrolled in the TV and radio program at the S.I. Newhouse School of Public Communications at Syracuse – the Alma Mater of TV personalities Ted Koppel, Bob Costas and Dick Clark – and graduated with a master's degree.

Norm Rumack presents former Toronto Blue Jay Paul Molitor with a "Hammerhead Alert" T-shirt.

His first big job came in 1981, when he worked as a researcher/programmer on CBC TV's midday magazine show. Through a network of connections he made at Mother Corp, he was introduced to Ralph Mellanby, who was director at the time of Don Cherry's Grapevine. Rumack worked at a variety of jobs on the show and met some incredible guests, including Bobby Orr and Smokin' Joe Frazier. He and Cherry hit it off quickly, reminiscing about the great Leaf-Flyer playoff brawls of the 1970s.

After his stint on Grapevine, Rumack drifted between jobs, working for a short time in 1985 as an aerobics instructor at Canadian Women's Fitness. He also visited Europe and spent a few months in Israel.

Returning to Canada in late '85, Rumack was frustrated at not being able to land a broadcasting job.

Instead, he took a different tack. "I thought that instead of looking for a job, I'd create my own production company, Sequence 33 Productions." One of the company's projects was presenting a documentary on Canadian Viet Nam veterans. Thanks to the publicity he brought to the group, Canadian and U.S. vets were honored with a puck-dropping ceremony to start a game in Detroit's Joe Louis Arena.

From there, the issue snowballed. Rumack worked with two U.S. Congressmen to organize a memorial ceremony for the veterans at the Viet Nam Memorial wall in Washington. In March 1988, President Reagan signed a bill extending full benefits to Canadian veterans.

Afterwards, Rumack landed a job with CTV, working as editor/producer/researcher at Canada AM. At the height of the intifadah, he got Benjamin Netanyahu, then Israel's ambassador to the UN, and the Palestinian UN representative to discuss the issue on air at a time when such dialogues were rare.

In April 1991, Rumack was among 40 staffers let go by the network. He took a job with CFRB, mostly screening calls, but also getting some on-air exposure. From there, he was recruited to the Fan and was paired with Jim Richardson right after Jays Talk, going on the air from 11 p.m. to 2 a.m.

Expected to work again at 5 a.m., the two spent a lot of nights killing time at the Golden Griddle on Eglinton and Redpath.

"We were so excited to be on the air in a major market," Rumack said. "It was tiring, but it was fun. I think they were getting us as much on-air experience as possible."

The air time gave him the chance to apply some valuable broadcasting lessons. "I learned very quickly at CFRB that if you score high in the love/hate index with the audience, you'll have a large following. But," he continued, "if you're a phony, people will see right through you."

His admiration for Wendel Clark was real and as someone who always admired hockey's enforcers, making friends with Leaf tough guy Tie Domi was a natural.

Rumack believes it's important to do your homework (hence the heavy reading list) and treat athletes with respect. They don't mind answering tough questions if you're prepared, he said. "When I interview them, I want to present the whole person and not focus only on the negatives."

He was instrumental in presenting The Players, an in-depth interview show that featured top athletes like Mario Lemieux, Paul Molitor, Rod Carew and Eric Lindross.

Currently, Stormin' Norman continues to work nights as well as an afternoon shift with Globe and Mail columnist Marty York. He's also appeared on a cable TV call-in show on community access stations.

"I'm a character guy," he acknowledged. "In terms of name awareness, I think most people who are sports fans in this market know the name, Stormin' Norman."

Old dog learns new trick

By JORDAN MAX

This past winter, my wife and I decided that it was finally time to make a concerted effort to teach our children to skate. I freely admit I never learned to skate properly, which impeded my hockey career.

Last Laugh

My mother, who told me "you think after having paid thousands of dollars for those braces, I'm going to let your teeth get knocked out? This is a profession for a nice Jewish boy?" may have had something to do with it. Most professional figure skaters still have their own teeth.

My wife, on the other hand, excelled at skating, and even learned to figure skate.

So there we were on the ice, trying to teach our children to skate. In my situation, it's hard to tell the teacher and student apart. I can go forward, even do a crossover turn, I just can't stop or go backwards. As a result, I was pretty much stuck in the "kiddie zone" of the rink, while the others were speed skating.

During those many frustrating afternoons, I found myself thinking about our roles as Jewish parents. There's nothing for motivation like the prospect of children in a day school, who are fast approaching your own knowledge level. Remember, when your children in a Jewish day school are learning Mishna in grade 8, they're already halfway to law school. The Shema says "And you shall teach [Torah] to your children," not the other way around.

So, after Pesach, I finally decided to join a new Gemarah (Talmud) class on Masechet Rosh Hashana offered at shul. The trouble was, this class was to start daily at 6 a.m., before davening.

After I came up with every conceivable excuse not to join, my children (bless them) reminded me of Rabbi Akiva, who only started to learn the aleph-bet at age 40.

Believe me, getting up at 5:30 is the easy part, although it has necessitated some evening schedule changes, like no more late night television. And just like my sons, I leave my clothes out the night before, except for socks. I like a little mystery in my life, so in the darkness, when I reach into the drawer, I never know what color I've selected until I get to shul. Being colorblind, as long as they match each other, I'm happy.

You're probably expecting me to say how the learning is fantastic, (which it is) and that I've found I have a natural talent for it (definitely not). But there's no turning back for me, I can't get a refund on the book.

Did you know there are actually four New Years in the Jewish calendar. What, now I have to go to shul eight days a year?

Despite Rabbi Breitowitz's dynamic teaching style and breadth of knowledge, learning Gemarah is hard, head-breaking work for me, especially at 6 a.m. I can best describe it as trying to rev your brain from zero to 60 in two seconds flat. In that case, I could probably use a block heater.

In fact, I'm merely treading water in the Sea of Talmud. On the positive side, by the time I get to work, my brain (now fully awake) is in high gear, fueled by pure logic (and very strong coffee). And I find it definitely does help my conceptual and analytical skills. It's like law school without the tuition, egos or exams.

As a side effect, I think I've stumbled onto a solution to the paradox of plummeting Jewish literacy despite rising secular education levels, intelligence and learning capacity. We live in a society which is extremely competitive, individualistic and materialistic. Maybe we should market Talmud as both the intellectual equivalent of Tae-Bo, and as an exclusive, elite activity in which all achievement-oriented Jews should want to participate.

In other words, the solution to Jewish adult education is to raise, not lower expectations. The marketing campaign could go something like, "So you've got your MBA, your law degree, your PhD. But can you handle Talmud?" Throw in a Gala dinner and they'd be filling the shul study halls in no time flat.

There's a whole Sea of Talmud out there. Don't keep yourself in the wading pool. Just put on a bathing suit, your water wings if you need them, and jump right in. The water's fine. And, unlike hockey, you get to keep your teeth.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

I'm really concerned for my friend David because his best friends are really mean to him. They constantly abuse him, mentally and emotionally. It has now come to the point where he is getting really depressed. I told him to stick up for himself, because it will show his "friends" that he won't take the abuse anymore. David tried to say something, but they just thought that it was a joke, and it didn't help him at all. I have also tried to speak to his friends to tell them to stop, but they think it is all fun and games. Is there anything that I can do to help David?

Sarah, David's concerned friend

Dear Concerned Friend,

Firstly, you should be commended for looking out for your friend. It seems that you and David share a great friendship, unlike those he has with his other friends. A friendship must exist between two people who both contribute and benefit from the friendship. If one friend is the only one who puts in an effort, than this is a one-sided friendship, which almost always fades and breaks apart. Long-lasting friends care for one another, and respect the other person's feelings. It seems that David's friends are not fulfilling these essential requirements of friendship. This is an abusive relationship which should be resolved, or ended.

If David is becoming depressed because of his "friends," than he should attempt to find other friends, and leave the abusive friends behind. Maybe you should try to incorporate David into your group of friends and bring him out with other people so that he can expand his social horizons.

It is definitely very difficult to make new friends, but it may be necessary for David to do that in order to make new friends, who hopefully will treat him properly. Albeit a drastic change for David, it might be necessary.

If David does, however, wish to attempt to reconcile with his old friends, than it may be possible for you to help him by acting as a middleman. This means that you will talk for David to his friends, so that they do not feel as though they are being threatened or accused. Although you and David have already spoken to his friends, try talking to them one more time, and tell them that their actions are having a very negative affect on David's self-esteem.

Hopefully, David's friends will understand that their treatment of him is abusive, or David will make new friends who will treat him in a nicer fashion. You have been a great friend to David, and with a friend like you, David will surely never be alone.

Karilani is a composite name for three girls, who are close friends and in Grade 11 in Toronto.

Good band has strong rapport with audience

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to the CJN

Music is a vital part of a good party. Later, when you and your guests recall what a great time you had, the music will be one of the first things to echo in your memory.

When you choose your band, there are some key things to look for, say Morris Kast of the Sky's Band (1-905-561-4404), and Shelley Miller of the Shelley Miller Band (484-1044). The band leaders have similar ideas on the qualities of a good band.

Good band musicians have fun playing. They work well with each other, and with other professionals like the caterers. Rapport with the guests is equally important – and includes dressing for the occasion. "We're a performance, and we're going to be looked at," Miller explains.

You, the host, should contribute actively to this rapport. Kast has noticed that while people want things lively, they don't always say so; so he encourages you not to be shy about telling the band leader what you want.

Versatility is another basic. The band leaders say, look for a band that plays songs from the '40s to the '90s – everything from Latin to swing, Motown to the Top 40 – to suit a range of guests, aged 10 to 90. This is especially important for celebrations like weddings.

Versatility includes shifts in mood. For example, you want mellow music while you're eating, soft enough to talk while it's playing, yet with enough volume to hear it if you want to listen. They say between courses, you need something livelier, and for dancing, even more so.

Versatility and rapport are connected. Along with the "must play" list, both Kast and Miller leave room for requests and improvising. For much of an evening's repertoire, they take their cues from the guests' mood at a given time; and pleasing everyone means mastering many songs and styles.

The Sky's is mainly a wedding band, with peppy, high-energy musicians who like to move with the music. They have a large repertoire of dance tunes to get your guests out on the floor.

The Sky's place a lot of emphasis on the singers, Kast says. Four front singers – two female and two male – are on stage all night long, and there are plenty of duets. The singers also dance.

He says the instrumentals are strong too – horns include trumpet and sax; and the rhythm section has piano, bass, drums, congas and guitar.

Miller composes unique arrangements and medleys, and he will work with themes for your event, he says. He always has at least three lead vocalists; and some of the instrumentalists sing as well.

With plenty of musicians, the live music can be almost continuous, Miller says.

He plans for no live music breaks until the main course is served or the speeches start. His mellow dinner music runs all through dinner except during speeches and prayers. Sometimes there's another break when the sweet table opens.

Both Kast and Miller urge you to choose your band as early as possible.

Book photographer early to avoid disappointment

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Student Intern

Bands energize the evening. Caterers offer sumptuous meals. Yet photographs capture the moments of the party.

Mike Day of The Art of Weddings (698-0186) and Greg Dean of Signature Photographs (784-4488) are experienced photographers when it comes to weddings, bnei/bnot mitzvah or other parties.

Day leans toward a more documentary style of photography. He favors some black and white photos, perhaps stemming from his photo-journalism background. He likes having fun with his clients, so the overall experience is far from boring.

"Personality is important. No one wants a photographer ruining a wedding day. He has to be nice, polite and not too overbearing."

Dean agrees that personality plays into the job. "Making friends is a good thing," he says. "If you have a connection with the client, the easier the day will go."

If assigned to a bar or bat mitzvah, Dean will shoot some pictures of the family a week before; he might take them to a park or to their house for an easy shoot when the family is not worried about guests, the catering or their child's Torah reading.

Both Dean and Day shoot around 300 to 400 pictures a day, with the client choosing 30 to 50.

Kids make some of the best photo subjects, says Day.

Dean agrees, and says that he spends time with the children before the shoot. He likes working with children, and not forcing them to do anything. "Photographers have to see eye-to-eye with kids," he says.

He recommends booking a photographer as soon as the date of the function is arranged. Signature is already booking for 2002.

Before choosing a photographer, Day suggests visiting studios and seeing the different styles and pictures. Photography boils down to pictures, he says, and to make clientele happy, there must be excellent photos.

Dean believes in a relaxed atmosphere, with creative pictures and different styles. Yet, his photographers still joke around, and the result is that "people are thankful that they actually enjoyed the shooting," he says.

"There's no pressure, no hard sell."

Day stresses the importance of honesty and open communication in a photographer.

"Make sure you know exactly what you're getting," he warns. "Find out the exact cost. You must be aware of everything."

Plenty of great places to throw a party

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Student Intern

You may have the flowers, the DJ and the photographer, but you still need to book the right hall for your simchah.

Casa Loma has offered its venue for parties and functions for 40 years, according to catering manager Tina Katz.

The grand hall, the library and the conservatory can accommodate 174 people, says Katz. The grand hall is used mainly for receptions, the library for dinner and dancing, and the conservatory for the sweet table.

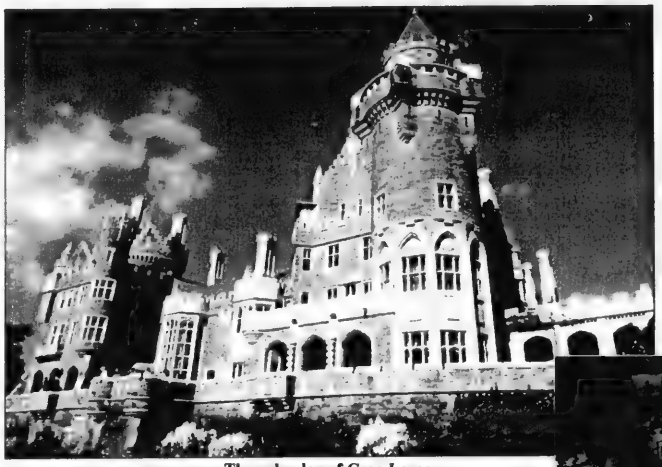
The library includes rows of books, an ornate ceiling and a window overlooking the terrace area. The grand hall features a 60-foot ceiling and an accessible door to a terraced garden. The conservatory has a medieval courtyard feel, with bronze doors and a small fountain bubbling in the summer months.

Kosher meals can be catered by Peter Graben Fine Foods.

"We go through [every detail] with clients; everything must be considered, says Katz."

Feel comfortable with the hall manager, she adds. Make suggestions, and be honest about what is required for the party. It is important to get involved. "This [is] a major event in your life, and we hope this memory will last a lifetime," says Katz.

Baycrest Hospitality (785-2500) tends to favor corporate or conference events. Sharon Bizouati, manager, says Baycrest Hospitality features two banquet halls, an outdoor garden and patio and a fireplace in the winter. Located west of the hospital, the Wagman Centre is strictly kosher and offers its own in-house caterer.



The splendor of Casa Loma.

While still offering bnei/bnot mitzvah, weddings and birthdays, Bizouati says the hall also gives Jewish organizations a venue for luncheons or dinners.

"We can fit 10 to 500," she says. "We can arrange the room for any function and offer audio-visual services."

She says that Baycrest is unique because it is central, and it is a one-stop shop: for other party details, Baycrest has dozens of referrals.

"Remember, we're here to help," offers Bizouati. "If you don't know what you want, talk to us."

Book both halls as soon as possible, they suggest.

Abundance of great wines

Top-quality kosher wines

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Student Intern

Kosher wines, such as these from Mazel, are world-winners.

Who doesn't enjoy a Weinstock Cabernet Sauvignon once in a while? Or how about a semi-sweet Bartenura Asti from Italy?

LCBO (925-5266) or Mazel Wines (631-8071) can assist in choosing the right kosher wine.

Wine is often essential at any function. Many people, however, think kosher wine is overly sweet and of poor quality. Yet, there is an abundance of high-quality kosher wine out there, as the president of Mazel Wines explains.

Her extensive product list includes Baron Herzog, Bartenura, Gamla and Givon. All are world-winners, from such places as New York State, France, Italy and Israel.

"In the past, kosher wine selection was very restricted," she says, requesting not to be named. "Now, many companies are happy to make top quality kosher wine."

Robin Sirutis, product consultant of LCBO at the Manulife Centre, says that people still think kosher means sweet.

"The best thing is to experiment," she recommends, "because there's lots of great stuff out there."

As connoisseurs know, different wines go with different meals. For instance, Bartenura Royal 18 Peach (a delicate pink white with a slight effervescence) goes well with desserts, fruits and snacks. A Baron Herzog Zinfandel (a sweet, fragrant red wine) is best sipped with cheese, light and dark meat, pasta and fruit. A Givon-Barkan Golden Sweet (hearty gold wine from Israel) is ideal with fish, light meat, fried foods and desserts. For fish or light dairy food, like Shavuot meals, Kedem 144 and Baron Herzog White Zinfandel is recommended. With chicken, a lighter red wine, like Fortant de France, should be used.

Sirutis says world famous Chardonnay, Merlot and Cabernet are finding homes in the Jewish market. She credits it to the increased sophistication of Jewish wine lovers and the endless variety on shelves, as at the Hilda and Clark LCBO kosher kiosk, with kosher wines, liquors and spirits.

Is there a difference between kosher and non-kosher wine?

In the past, Sirutis says, kosher wines were boiled to give off a cooked taste. Now, kosher wines are flash pasteurized, which is a brief heating process to make the wine kosher.

"There's wine for everybody," says the president of Mazel. "You can't go wrong."

An experienced wine taster, she says, will look for texture and aroma. The wine has to have substance and a good color. The full bouquet (aroma) indicates a high-quality wine.

All wines at Mazel are also kosher for Passover.

Enjoy yourself: let consultants do the work

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

If you hire a party planner, you are guaranteed to be treated like a guest at your own simchah.

Marla Kay (905-882-2042), a bridal consultant and party planner for 17 years – she averages about 40 or 50 functions a year – says a consultant relieves all the stress and anxiety that comes with making a simchah.

"At the party, your whole family is on display. There is excitement and expectations, and the consultant makes sure that everything happens the way it should. Our prime directive is to help make a party you will always remember."

A good consultant, she says, takes the party on as if it were her very own. "From the moment I get a phone call from a client, I give the party all the care and devotion that I would if it were my party."

Judy Stein (905-764-7604), also a party planner, says that a consultant should be available to her clients from the very beginning until the end of the party.

"Of course, there are different packages according to clients' needs. Some people need guidance throughout the whole process, from drawing up the guest list, to ordering the invitations and hiring the professionals.

Judy Stein

"Others have all the basics at hand, but want someone there the day of the party. When I'm there, my clients feel a load lifted from their shoulders."

When she's at a party, says Stein, she puts herself in the "guests' shoes" in order to see how smoothly the party is running. "If I feel the music needs picking up or slowing down, I talk to the musicians or disc jockey; if I'm waiting too long between courses, I speak to the caterer."

Everything she does, she says, allows the hosts to mingle and enjoy being with their friends and family.

It is essential for consultants to be familiar with party venues and keep up with all the new locations, Kay says. "I need to know what to recommend according to a client's budget and needs.

"I know what places can make arrangements for kosher food, which are great for dancing, and which may be suitable for a cocktail party. I spend a lot of time checking out places and speaking to the managers."

For a wedding, says Kay, she arrives at the venue before the bride gets dressed. "I have a schedule prepared so everyone knows exactly where they should be at what time.

"Pictures are an important part of the wedding, and I love outdoor pictures. If it's a nice day, I have driven the bridal party to another location to be photographed."

As for potential "disasters," Stein and Kay have both averted a few. Kay had to revive a groom with smelling salts and she had to mask blood on another groom's shirt with white-out, she says. "When a bride dropped red wine on her dress, she was hysterical. I took soda and water and cleaned the whole thing up."

Stein, who carries Ban-It soap, "her miracle soap," was able to remove grease from a bridal gown.

"My bridal bag contains everything anyone would ever need, including sandpaper to fix heels, shoelaces, smelling salts, and tea biscuits if someone is hungry, she says.

"If someone ever says, 'I wish I had...' I make sure I have it next time."

Food is always the best part

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Student Intern

Food is a crucial part of any simchah. From the presentation to the taste, caterers can either make or break a party.

Kosher caterers aren't too difficult to find in Toronto. Le Chinoix (905-709-8211) and Zuchter-Berk Creative Catering (905-738-6880) are two examples of fine glatt kosher caterers party planners can rely on.

Raphy Amar's Le Chinoix is a newcomer on the catering scene, having just opened its doors several weeks ago. But Amar has years of experience at Le Parc, where he continues to preside as its exclusive kosher caterer.

Amar touts Le Chinoix with its internationally known chefs as the most upscale kosher restaurant in the Greater Toronto Area.

Amar believes Toronto needs to adopt an open-policy style of catering, as in Montreal where clients holding simchahs in shuls can use whichever kosher caterer they please, he says. Synagogues shouldn't force caterers on their members.

Amar says, "You'll never be bored of our menu," which consists of Chinese-Italian cuisine that is exclusively kosher. An extensive wine and exotic drink list is also available.

Some specialties that Amar particularly favors are jagged pear salad with delicate green and tangy walnut dressing; provini veal chop stuffed with mushroom duxcelles and infused veal. Dessert is divine with a spring roll banana strudel on a pool of caramel cream drizzled with chocolate syrup.

"Food presentation is important," Amar says. "The kosher community is used to seeing the same dishes over and over. We're doing impressive things with our food."

Amar likes to think of Le Chinoix as a one-stop shop: everything can be arranged, from coordination to setup. "We don't want our clients to be running around a lot," he says.

David Berk of Zuchter-Berk suggests looking for reputation, creativity and the quality of food and service in a caterer. It's important to keep up with the times, as his business does, and to provide new and innovative ideas, he says.

"We introduced mashed potato martinis," Berk says. An hors-d'oeuvre item, garlic potatoes are scooped into a martini glass and served with either garlic-pesto or black bean chili and mushroom sauce.

Strictly kosher, the caterer company has hosted bar and bat mitzvahs, weddings, special birthdays and organizational dinners. Zuchter-Berk also caters at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda and Adath Israel synagogues.

Specialties include basil balsamic chicken breast with jimp-fried assorted peppers and exotic mushrooms. The signature dessert is Kahlua mousse pie on a mango-raspberry coulis.

A family business since 1930, reputation speaks a lot for reliability, Berk says and yet the menu is never boring, as it changes on a daily basis he adds. Often, he says, Zuchter-Berk goes back to comfort foods like mashed potatoes or a variety of soups.

Zuchter-Berk is one of the first caterers to set up its own Web site, at zuchterberk.com. Visitors can literally browse the menu. They can also order items or just see what the facility is like.

"You must have trust in your caterer," says Amar. "The relationship of caterer and client is built on honesty."

Berk agrees. Caterers need to relate to people; clients want to feel comfortable with the caterer they're working with, he says.

For indecisive customers, Le Chinoix and Zuchter-Berk both offer sampling of various dishes.

Caricatures are gentle, funny, good-natured fun

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Often, party guests want to give a gift that is not unique. A well known brand name may represent quality. Often, though, you do want a gift to be something no one else has; but what to give? Many such gifts, like handmade clothes, take a lot of time to make, and require specialized skills you may not have. Others, like most original works of art, are very expensive.

However, not all unique works of art are costly. For instance, you and the guests at your party might like a caricature done by a professional artist.

For 11 years, Brian Montenegro (703-3591) has drawn caricatures at Ontario Place and at bnei/bnot mitzvah. He also paints and does illustration and animation. In five to 10 minutes, he will complete a drawing of a guest enjoying a favorite sport or hobby.

A Montenegro caricature is full frontal black and white, with a strong outline and form. It's true to life, but compliments the subject. "I glamorize the women," Montenegro laughs, "and usually give the men more hair."

His work has a polished, urbane look, but keeps the spontaneity of a sketch.

While it's not just dashed off, it's not too meticulous either. When done quickly, he explains, a drawing has a fluidity that you lose if you work more slowly.

Mark Ciale (203-2514) also has 11 years' experience, including four at Ontario College of Art. He enjoys working at parties and schmoozing with the guests.

Sometimes, Ciale says, people in a group single out one of their friends and urge him to have his caricature drawn. Often, this person will be the clown of the group.

Ciale also works quickly, to capture true-to-life details of the face.

His approach is often to make gentle, good-natured fun. Most of us have humorous traits which we like about ourselves, say, a special way of smiling; this is Ciale's favorite theme.

Both artists work with black Magic Markers, which make a strong, bold stroke. At the same time, being quick drying and hard to erase, markers demand a sure, practised, confident hand.

While many people equate a caricature with a cartoon, there are important differences. Cartoons are often partisan, political and malicious; they usually single out one or two features of the subject, and expose them to ridicule.

Both Montenegro and Ciale, on the other hand, want you to enjoy the drawing. And they want you to feel good about the person portrayed in the drawing: good enough that you'll keep it, even frame it.

Don't underestimate party's decor

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Planning a party always involves several elements at once: working on a menu, choosing a band, making a guest list, and doing all the other things that need doing.

Of course, it's essential to have good food and music, and make sure all the right people are invited. Don't underestimate the decor, though. Along with the music, it's the first thing your guests will notice when they come in.

Choose your decor artist carefully; and remember, no two are exactly alike. For example, Renee Birnbaum of An Affair to Remember (905-881-6686) and Tammy Goodman of Artistic Creations (905-508-8193) have different approaches to their work. You'll want to pick the person who suits you best.

Birnbaum and Goodman each like to create new, interesting concepts. They co-operate well with the other party professionals, such as the caterers. And they each tailor their work to a unique match with you and your event. Their differences are in what could be called the personality of their work.

Birnbaum creates a "Cinderella effect," totally transforming your setting, enhancing the visual impact of everything in the room. And at An Affair to Remember, you find every decor component – centrepieces, balloons, flowers, props and lighting – under one roof.

Birnbaum emphasizes the fact that she stays within your budget, be it lavish or moderate. She works with themes, and with every ambience and type of event, from kids' parties to corporate lunches. And if the bar mitzvah boy wants to be in on the consultations for his simchah, she's glad to talk with him.

Color schemes, as Birnbaum points out, add a lot to a party. A wedding for example, can be warmed and enlivened by colors which are lighter, yet in keeping with decorum. A good decorator can always create something a bit out of the ordinary.

Tammy Goodman of Artistic Creations has extensive graphic arts experience, including cartoon work. Her photo album is full of interesting ideas.

She enjoys doing kids' birthdays, and is known for her Crafty Kidz parties. And she likes detail, both in organization and in artistry.

Goodman does a lot of her work with a thin foam board – not styrofoam, but a less bulky kind which allows for more detail and a cleaner finish. Her work is cut, painted and assembled by hand, with every stage under her direct supervision.

Artistic Creations integrates your theme with everything in the room.

If it's hockey, for example, the place cards will look like hockey cards.

Goodman even does theme-related candles and painted kippot.

As to when to book, the old advice still holds: soon. Good artists are always in demand; so the best way to get the one you want is to phone as far ahead as you can.

Other decor actors advertising in this supplement are: Party Props, 905-726-8878; Perlit Novelties, 665-4838.

Use a professional to film your simchahs

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

Only a professional videographer can assure top-quality film, creative editing and back-up cameras, says Brian Korson of Video Excellence (905-731-4355).

"It is essential, in case the prime camera goes out, to have a back-up including lights, battery, mike and bulbs. That way, no part of the party is left out. I have heard about people viewing their video and finding chunks of it blank. That would not have happened had they had back-up material."

When hiring a videographer, says Korson, a client should find out if he rents or owns the equipment. "If someone rents the equipment, it is possible that he is not familiar with the machine. Again, parts of the party could be left out while the videographer is trying to figure out how to use his camera."

The client should also find out exactly who will be filming the party. "You don't want to hire a certain videographer, just to find out someone else, whose work you've never seen, arrives at your party. Find out everything up front."

Korson says his equipment is wireless, which gives the room a much cleaner look. "It's also a matter of safety. There are no wires for guests to trip over."

Digital cameras are the best for good quality film, he says. "When a videographer uses digital filming and digital editing, results are much sharper and the color is clearer. As well, digital equipment requires less light than traditional cameras, so they are less obtrusive."

Brian Korson of Video Excellence.

He stresses that for good quality digital film, every step in the process must be digital. "It has to be digital film in a digital camera, edited in a digital suite for the best resolution and color possible."

Because the resolution on the digital film is so high, says Korson, prints can be lifted off it. "These do not replace the pictures a photographer will take, because the quality is not quite as good. But if someone sees a shot that was not on a photograph, they can capture it."

Most videographers offer packages to suit most budgets, he says. "At the lowest end, the videographer can merely capture the day professionally.

Clients then get a good quality record of events. On the highest end, full editing can include a photo montage, animation, character credits or a recap summary of events at the end of the video. Of course, there are all sorts of options in between. The video could cost anywhere from $995 to $4,000."

When videographers come out, he says, they should be dressed appropriately for the party. "If it's black tie, he'll wear a tux, if it's casual, he'll dress down. It's important for him to look like a guest, so he doesn't stand out."

It is also important to interview clients well in advance to determine their needs. "Some people want every guest given a chance to say a few words on camera; others want just immediate family or friends on tape. Every client is different, and the videographer must respect their requests."

Joy of clothes-shopping for kids

'Quality is numero uno'

BY DAVID SILVERBERG
Student Intern

When it comes to dress-wear, children may be difficult to shop for. The clothes may make them fidget, there is the possibility of outgrowing the clothes after a growth spurt, and it is necessary to purchase comfortable and good looking fashions.

Three stores offer selection and advice. Experts at Crawford (782-8137) at Lawrence and Bathurst, Beatties (481-4459) near Eglinton and Avenue, and Kids N' Company (905-764-0755), at Yonge and Doncaster, agree that comfort and quality should be considered when shopping for kids' formals.

Paul Spiar, owner of Crawford since 1979, says his store has specialized in boyswear for the past 10 years. His biggest seller is the suit for special occasions like a bar mitzvah. The colors of his suits range from blue to black, with a selection of tans and olives. Suits run from $160 to $300, and sports jackets range from $125 to $215.

"Selling boyswear is not something that can be done in 15 minutes," says Spiar. "It takes time and effort."

Spiar believes listening to the boy is important because it's obvious he'd rather be anywhere than shopping.

Perhaps that is the reason why Crawford has a play area for the youngsters, in case they get bored waiting for their parents to make a decision. The area has a basketball net, pinball and other games to occupy the child's time and to make sure the parents and the staff aren't rushed.

Beatties, which has over 1,200 suits and sports jackets in its 4,000 square foot store, has many brand names the average adolescent will recognize: Calvin Klein, Tommy Hilfiger, Point Zero, Perry Ellis and DKNY. David Hadden, owner for the last two years, cites Perry Ellis as one of the biggest sellers.

"Lots of clients want good quality with good value," says Hadden. His suits start at $100 and go as high as $299. Every bar mitzvah suit comes with a $25 gift certificate, he adds.

Also, Beatties includes husky sizes 22-36 in its suit selection.

Neil Rosenberg, president of Kids N' Company, carries popular children brands such as Mickey and Co., Ocean Pacific, Buster Brown and UFO. The store leans toward casual wear, with name brand Cargo the big winner of the season.

"Flares are big," Rosenberg says. "So are novelty knits, embroidered butterflies on girls' clothing and girls' fashion from L.A."

Rosenberg says that kids prefer more wash and wear clothing, something that doesn't need to be pampered or shipped to the cleaners every time the parents spot dirt.

"It is important to shop at a store that you have trust and confidence in," says Spiar. "Visit first, walk around and shop there only if you feel comfortable."

"The value and quality of the suit is very important," says Hadden. "Look at the cost and how the suit fits your child."

Rosenberg agrees. "Quality is numero uno."

Suits for bar mitzvahs are big sellers at Crawford's.

Looking for a perfect gift

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Student Intern

What do you buy the person who has everything? Where can you get the perfect gift for somebody?

Leila Amoils, of Il Argento (905-889-5175), and Jackie Kiasa of Ashley's (964-9111) may be of some assistance.

Il Argento carries silverware, candlesticks, challah platters, sterling picture frames and tea sets, among other things, says Amoils. Many items come from South America, which is an influence of her Venezuelan background.

"Mostly the silver platters are typical South American design," says Amoils. "It has that colonial look, a mixture of modern and contemporary."

Silver platters are priced from $150 to $200; decorating platters – they are ideal for wedding or holidays – are made with hand-beaten silver and range from $30 to $350.

"We have a large selection of Judaica," Amoils says. "We have challah knives, Kiddush cups, candlesticks, even silver dreidels.

Specialty dreidels are in the $45 range. Kiddush cups are sometimes made from copies of archaeological artifacts uncovered in Israel. They are made of sterling and ceramic and "last for the rest of your life", she says.

Il Argento carries a lot of silverware...

In addition, Amoils has a rare menorah, designed with hieroglyphics and ancient symbols, that is a copy of an excavated artifact from Israel.

Candlesticks make a great gift for bat mitzvahs, Amoils says. One interesting pair, colored with delicate pastel blues and amber, has a motif of flowers with twisting vines curling upward.

A boy reaching the age of bar mitzvah may appreciate a Torah pointer, says Amoils.

"[In our store] it's like entering a home," says Amoils. "Feel free to walk around, look for something you like.

"The merchandise we carry, no one else in Canada has it," she says. "We have an exclusive contract to give our gifts that different look."

Kiasa, manager of Ashley's for 50 years, says the store offers a huge range of crystal, silver, pewter and porcelain.

Some of the most popular gift items – they could be crystal, figurines, vases or candlesticks – are from Waterford, she says. "The Waterford crystal chest set is exquisite."

The 24,000 square-foot store also has a large selection of Judaica gifts, among them, are seder plates, menorahs and Kiddush cups.

Ashley's offers a huge range of crystal, silver, pewter and porcelain.

Everybody wants to be served well and staff needs qualified expertise, Kiasa says.

However, knowing a person well makes it easier to shop for them, she adds.

"The better you know somebody, the better ability you have to get a better gift. You want that person to cherish the gift that will complement his home or lifestyle."

Amoils recommends buying gifts that are functional. "It's not going to sit on a shelf and collect dust. It should have use and the person should have pride in it."

No one has yet found the formula for the universally perfect gift. But Amoils has a good idea of what the recipient's reaction might be upon getting the perfect gift.

"You open the box, it catches your eye and you immediately say 'I love it! '– that's a perfect gift."

Loot bags/party favors complete a simchah

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Student Intern

To children, loot bags are the icing on the cake. The adult version of a loot bag is the party favor, says Isaac Soberano of Alpha-Tribeca Group (398-9800).

Soberano gave every guest at his son's brit milah a chocolate bar with his child's information on the wrapper; instead of the name of the chocolate, it read Here He Is, instead of the net weight of the bar, Soberano included his son's weight.

"Everybody is loving those bars," Soberano says. "And they're kosher, too."

Soberano's company mainly deals with corporate affairs, anniversaries, and bnai/bnot mitzvah where custom T-shirts, mugs and baseball caps are especially popular as give-aways.

"We work directly with the client so we have the most information about what he wants," he says.

At Bagz of Fun, children get to make toys out of their loot bags.

For instance, for the golf lover a T-shirt compressed into a golf ball might do the trick, he says. You twist the top off the fake golf ball, and a wearable, wrinkle-free shirt with a custom design is ready for use.

At the 2000-sq.-ft. showroom, says Soberano, people can browse through such items as mouse pads with personalized logos, a pen that can blow bubbles or a T-shirt that can be colored in with crayons.

Slinkies, in many different colors and shapes, are popular again with the kids.

"People want something creative, something with high-perceived value and something that's wearable."

Bev Bergman, of Bagz of Fun (665-5978), doesn't give children toys in their loot bags; they have to make the toys.

Appropriate for ages 4 to 8, says Bergman, the loot bag may have items for jewelry-making, puppet-making, mask decoration, construction and more. No junk food is included.

"When kids go home and make the craft, they love it," Bergman says. Girls favor the jewelry kit while boys like the construction items. The construction bag will include notched popsicle sticks, papers that are imprinted with interior and exterior finishes, paint and paintbrush.

Bergman, mother of three children, always had craft material in her home, and found her children enjoyed "making something out of nothing."

Bergman says she wanted to get away from the usual junk in loot bags, and involve the children in an activity.

The instructions aren't how-to, Bergman stresses. They are merely suggestions, in order to give the children the most freedom.

Party favors should be special and exciting for every guest. Whether they are for a wedding anniversary or for a 3-year old's birthday party, "the fun should continue after the party."

Other places providing party favors are Suckers, 416-CANDIES.

All you need is under one roof

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

One advantage of getting all your party supplies under one roof is saving time. Deadlines and due dates always come too soon; and there are always more details and problems than you plan for.

It isn't just a matter of getting the best flowers, loot bags, etc. It's also a matter of having colors and designs match, and co-ordinating decor and props with everything else. This is important even if the party doesn't have a theme.

Party suppliers Norene Norris of Tyme to Party (905-737-2789), and Caroline Keane of Party Props (905-726-8878; 416-436-9379), both think a supplier should have a feel for decor and good design. Also, she should like people, and be a good organizer.

Keane also sees stress relief as part of her work. She has noticed that people under stress are liable to lose track of details. This may create a vicious circle: you miss one detail, worry about it so much that you miss another, and so on.

Happily, the process can be reversed. Success in handling one problem boosts confidence and energy, and makes it easier to tackle the next problem. The one-stop party supplier helps, by taking a lot of the details out of your hands from the start.

Some things you may need to get from a specialist; but Keane says that a good supplier has contacts with resource people. Having the right contacts is vital to this business, which is based mainly on referrals and good reputation.

A supplier's work resembles that of the party co-ordinator. If a supplier can't answer every question for you, she should know where to find the answer. Once she contacts other professionals, they can follow up with you, or work with the supplier, whichever you want.

Small-town-style of service

Some clients, Keane says, want to leave as much detail as possible in their supplier's hands. Equally often, though, the client wants to consult with the supplier at each stage, especially on one-of-a-kind artistic work like floral or wall decorations.

Norris enjoys brainstorming with her clients. She prefers a friendly small-town style of service, ready to go the extra mile for the client.

Most of her work is for bnei/bnot mitzvah and kids' parties; and most of her adult clients have fun too, enjoying the chance to be kids again.

Clients want to get something unique, Norris observes, but without spending a fortune. You can do this, she points out, with party favors and with loot bags, which account for a huge percentage of Norris' sales. To give personalized loot bags shows that you think of your guests as individuals.

Popular novelties, Norris says, include blow-up picture frames and pillows; liquid pencil cases (made of two layers of plastic with liquid between, which you can see moving); and sun visors with a battery-run fan to cool your forehead.

Does this sound like fun enough to tempt you to visit a party supplier?

Do it soon. A good supplier can work on short notice; but like all good professionals, the best are always in demand.

A singer's melody comes straight from the heart

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Music evokes emotions more directly than any other art. Visual art and writing usually require a moment's thought before we respond; but music seems to go straight from the ears to the heart.

When we hear a singer, we respond to the feeling of the music and to the meaning of the words. That is why a singer can add so much to the entertainment at a party.

In choosing a singer, listen to a tape, then hear a performance. Recordings give you an idea of voice quality and repertory; but they can be touched up, made perfect through technology. When you hear singers perform, they show you what they do spontaneously, in the presence of a demanding audience.

Gedalia Zweig of the Kiddish Club (977-3502; Web site www.geocities.com/Hollywood/Picture/5257) has a style that weaves Jewish musical ideas and contemporary pop into a blend both Jews and non-Jews can relate to.

For example, he has a Chanukah song, La La La La Latke. And his Bensch Licht Again is a takeoff on Kalmann Cohen's Let's Twist Again, with Cohen's permission.

Zweig plays electric or acoustic guitar. He also works with a five-piece band which includes himself, drums, sax, bass and keyboard. The band is on his demo tape.

Gedalia Zweig weaves Jewish musical ideas and contemporary pop.

He will do everything from playing solo for a small gathering, to working with other musicians as part of a larger entertainment package.

He prefers audiences of 200 or less, where he can resonate with people as individuals.

Of Zweig's three albums, the latest, Toys, is for kids. Moment magazine in the United States has it on the kids' music Top Ten list; and he's penetrating the U.S. market through Jewish bookstores. Book him as far ahead as possible, he advises, especially if your event is around Chanukah.

Fern Lindzon (445-9780) has a wide repertory from swing to Latin, and her own Fern Lindzon Band. She appears solo, in duets and trios, and with up to seven musicians, and can hire an additional singer. She's also a pianist, can accompany herself, and writes her own arrangements.

The old standards, especially songs by the Gershwins and Cole Porter, are among Fern's favorites. Their great lyrics and melodies have timeless appeal; and each time you sing a standard, you have to infuse it with a new, different feeling.

Today, Fern observes, these standards are enjoying a comeback. It's wonderful, she says, to sing at a bar mitzvah, and hear a 13-year-old request something by Holly Cole, or see younger people dancing to swing.

Fern also likes contemporary ballads by singers like Celine Dionne and Elton John. R&B and rock 'n roll, she leaves to her band, who have special interests in these forms. They're all jazz musicians, who can read music and improvise.

With so much variety available, picking a singer could take time; so start listening soon. You won't only enjoy the singer at your party: you'll also enjoy the process of choosing.

Artist's work conveys a feeling of movement

By SARAH HERSHENSON
WZPS

Frank Meisler likes to set things in motion. Whether it is his small sculpture pieces, full of whimsy and fun, or his larger pieces of sacred or decorative art, his work always conveys a feeling of movement.

One of his newest pieces, for example, is a spectacled chef, triumphantly holding aloft outdoor cooking tools. Upon pulling a lever at his midriff, a grill complete with sausages, a bottle of wine and glasses are revealed.

Meisler's famous camels, too, have heads that can be positioned to sway back and forth. "What you see is not necessarily what you get," Meisler says. "There is no one way of looking at anything."

Meisler believes his outlook on life stems from being born in Danzig, Germany. "Danzig is a city of contradictions," he says. "When I was growing up, many of its inhabitants were Jews from Poland and Germany. Nevertheless, each group had diametrically opposing views. Danzig was a city of culture, replete with museums and a renowned university. However it was also a hotbed of Nazi support during the war."

In August 1939, Meisler was one of 26 children who fled the Holocaust in a kindertransport to England. He was given a home in London by two aunts. After the war he studied architecture at Manchester University.

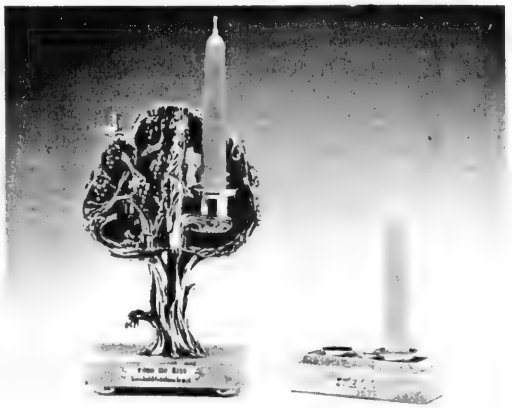
"My life has seen many changes," he recalls. "In England, I worked professionally as an architect and sculpture was my hobby. However, things assumed another view when I came to Israel in the early 1960s.

"My visit was supposed to be a 'working vacation', to serve as a consultant to the construction industry due to the tremendous amount of housing that was needed. Buildings were going up as fast as possible in order to accommodate the 1960s wave of aliyah. Unfortunately, the results were buildings that were symbols of an almost 'architectural bankruptcy' and I was slightly disillusioned. Therefore, after I decided to stay in Israel, I made up my mind to pursue my sculpting hobby as a career."

With an eye for detail and a careful, perhaps inherited, sense of business acumen, Meisler began designing and marketing his pieces. He had already established his studio in Old Jaffa by the time the Tel Aviv municipality got around to renovating the ancient port and turning it into a visitor's delight.

Today, the studio in Old Jaffa employs a number of skilled artisans and has a gallery on the premises. There are also galleries in central Tel Aviv and Jerusalem.

Many official gifts given by the State of Israel to dignitaries and notables come from his studio and many gift shops worldwide carry his beautifully crafted pieces which are made from pewter and brass and often set with semi-precious stones.



Frank Meisler's "The Tree of Life."

His best known work in Israel is the sculpture fountain in the lobby of the King Solomon hotel in Jerusalem – a globe-shaped relief of Jerusalem that has become both a local landmark and a much loved symbol of the Holy City.

His tribute to the 50th anniversary of the State of Israel is a scroll of Israel's Declaration of Independence, complete with replicas of the signers' signatures and a revolving Magen David.

Recently, Meisler was asked to make a set of Maranos candlesticks; disguised candlesticks that were used in Spain during the Inquisition. The candlesticks, hidden within a statue or decorative object, could appear or disappear with the flick of a lever or closing of a small door.

Meisler fashioned a statue, studded with semi-precious stones, called The Tree of Life. By opening two small doors at the base, the candlesticks are revealed.

"It is a project that intrigued me because it's an instance of ambiguity that saved both the lives and identity of many."

Meisler said he gets his ideas, "from a fertile, creative mind, which is sometimes tinged, just ever so slightly, with my black and often 'wicked' sense of humor."

However, not all his pieces are fanciful. Meisler recently was asked to assist in the design and decoration of Moscow's newest synagogue. After over 70 years when religion was outlawed by Communism, the Russian government decided to erect a memorial complex composed of three houses of worship in memory of Russia's huge losses during the Second World War: a Russian Orthodox church, a mosque and a synagogue.

"Faced with the memorial's immense responsibility, I did not know if I could do it justice," Meisler says. Nevertheless, his sense of professionalism took over and he admits it turned out better than he had hoped.

Inside the synagogue, Meisler designed a hexagonal bimah out of metal and wood. The materials he chose for the Holy Ark were metal and Jerusalem stone. Outside, he fashioned a bronze menorah mounted on black marble and on the inside walls, two sculptures, almost nine feet high, one depicting Moses receiving the Five Books, the other symbolizing the Twelve Tribes.

The Ukrainian government has commissioned him to design a new monument for the Jews who perished at Babi Yar. In Israel he looks forward to creating more Judaica and opening a new shop in Jerusalem's ancient Cardo shopping area.

Both the Ketubot on this page were done by Michael Shapiro of Ketubah Ketubah.

The art of Ketubah willl live through the new millennium

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

When we take an important step in life such as marriage, we make it formal through ceremony. Many important events have also been formalized by drawing up a document.

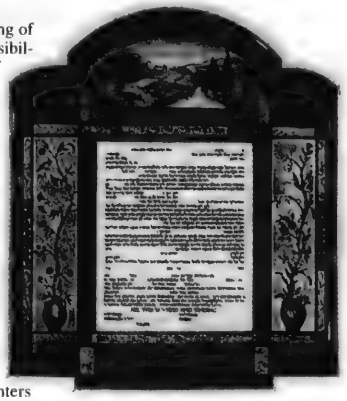
As legal texts, written documents hold us to our commitments by providing a permanent record. But a document is also visual. And if it bears witness to a major lifelong promise, it's a physical reminder of the values expressed in that promise – and almost calls out to be treated as a work of art.

Because marriage is not an ordinary commitment, a ketubah is not an ordinary legal document. As both written text and work of art, it pays tribute to all the many aspects of marriage.

Marriage is a sharing of property, and a responsibility for the wellbeing of spouses and children. It's a lifelong commitment to love and loyalty. It re-affirms a religious tradition, and it is a union of two unique individuals.

Brian Liss of the Liss Gallery (787-9872) and Michael Shapiro of Ketubah Ketubah (963-9191) offer a wealth of information on this uniquely Jewish artform.

Besides representing contemporary painters and sculptors and consulting on art acquisition, the Liss Gallery features artists who offer unique or limited-edition ketubot.



Limited editions consist of about 300 numbered copies. For individual commisioned works, artists use durable acrylics and oil paints. Parchment is available, but with modern inks. The gallery frames ketubot as well.

Ketubot reflect different historical eras. They also reflect the style of the artist, and in individually commissioned ketubot, the preferred imagery of the couple. As you might expect, this imagery is often drawn from the Song of Songs.

Ketubot can be commissioned before or after the marriage. For a hand-crafted work, says Liss, the wait is about three months.

Ketubah Ketubah specializes exclusively in ketubot. They represent 35 artists with a wide range of materials and styles, traditional and contemporary, creating everything from limited editions of 100 to 500 copies, to one-of-a-kind hand-painted work. Most are the size of a poster or frameable lithograph print.

Often, says Shapiro, a ketubah is the first art a couple buys. Many buy anniversary ketubot; and some young couples get them for their parents.

Texts used represent all denominations – Orthodox, Conservative and Reform.

The ketubah as art, says Shapiro, goes back to the Middle Ages, possibly earlier. After fading for awhile, interest in this artform has enjoyed a resurgence in the last 20 years.

The technology used, says Shapiro, combines new and old. In one style based on paper cutting, for example, the original is made by hand, much like a stencil; then copies are made with a laser.

Making ketubot, Shapiro points out, supports a large number of artists. If you commission one or buy a limited-edition copy, you pay special tribute to your own marriage.

Another place that does ketubah advertising in this supplement is: Ketubah, Haftarah by Karny Vorona, 226-3131.

'We have a gift for gift-giving'

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

Picture a child-sized car filled to the brim with baby clothes, soft toys and other baby products, and imagine the expression of the new parents who receive this unusual gift basket.

Depending on one's taste the same baby gifts can also be packed in a wagon or a white wicker child-size rocking chair.

These are just three of the many styles of gift baskets available at the Nutcracker Sweet (782-3232) at 1936 Avenue Rd., says store owner Elaine Akler. "Our slogan is we have a gift for gift giving."

Fifteen years ago, she bought the store, then a health food store, with the intension of converting it to a store specializing in gift baskets filled with gourmet foods and other gift items.

The creativity of putting together gift baskets appealed to her, Akler said. "We were one of the first people in the city doing gift baskets."

The quality of the items from the Nutcracker Sweet is very high and "the presentation is fabulous," she said. "There is no one who comes close."

The company does a large baby basket business, she said. "We either use a basket or toy as a container. We use a lot of Little Tikes toys and high-end soft toys, like Gund. All the sleepers we use are 100 percent cotton."

Gift baskets can be sent for all kinds of occasions such as an office opening or other corporate events, Akler said. "People have become more aware of gift baskets. It's become an item of choice for corporations. If you don't know someone that well, how can you go wrong with a gift basket of food?"

Corporate gift baskets mainly consist of gourmet cheese and crackers, anti pastos, chocolates, cookies as well as nuts and fresh fruit, she noted.

"These baskets leave a very lasting impression for the people who receive them. It's really exciting to get something that looks so beautiful, and it's full of exciting things that people wouldn't necessarily go out and buy themselves."

Nutcracker Sweet, which can provide party centrepieces and flowers for wedding and bnei/bnot mitzvah, does many hotel baskets for out of town guests attending simchahs. The baskets, which average in price from $20 to $30 include such things as soaps, cookies and mineral water.

"It's very nice if you come in from out of town to have a gift basket in your hotel room," Akler said. "We carry high quality cosmetic lines like Crabtree and Evelyn."

She says they also do anti-boredom baskets, get well baskets, as well as birthday baskets. "If people need help we have a lot of catalogues." Baskets start at $20 and can run as high as $500 for large deluxe-size containers.

Nutcracker has a wide assortment of containers to suit a variety of budgets, among them, silvers ice baskets, ceramic containers, mesh hat boxes as well as wicker baskets. She says a popular item is the Nutcracker Sweet basket– a black rod-iron basket named for the store "because everything in it is sweet."

Nutcracker uses a lot of ribbon, and the bows are all handmade, Akler says. "We always match to the occasion. We did a glass bowl with hand-painted lemons, and matched it to fabric ribbon which had lemons on it. We're always one step ahead of the trend. We're right with the latest colors."

Nutcracker offers a full line of kosher gift baskets, which would include cookies, nuts, antipastos, jams and crackers, she says.

"There's more upscale [kosher] products with nice packaging. At one time it was all so pedestrian."

She says nut and candy trays are good items to send to a shivah because of the way they're presented. People can just nibble. It's nice to have because there's generally a lot of people.

At least 50 percent of the orders are done over the phone, Akler says. "We deliver all over Canada and the United States. We do it by courier. Shipments leave every day for all destinations."

A Caribbean cruise is a wonderful honeymoon idea

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Immortalized in the Walter Matthau, Jack Lemmon movie Out To Sea, the MS Westerdam, the largest of the luxurious Holland America Line fleet, cruises the Eastern Caribbean each week departing from Ft. Lauderdale, Fla.

The exotic ports of call – perfect honeymoon spots– include Nassau, Bahamas, San Juan, Puerto Rico, St. Thomas, U.S. Virgin Islands and Half Moon Cay, Bahamas, a private resort owned by the cruise line.

The Westerdam's common areas are tastefully decorated with fine art and museum-quality antiques. The ship boasts seven lounges and three fine restaurants. Kosher meals can be pre-ordered and prepared prior to departure and are served in their original packaging.

A must-do on the Westerdam is to pamper yourself at Steiner of London's Ocean Spa. Beauty rituals of note include the La Therapie Facial, the Aromaspa Body Treatment and the Top to Toe massage and facial.

Specials are offered daily, including Relax in Paradise, a massage on a secluded area of the beach at Half Moon Cay. Steiner also operates the fitness centre and beauty salon.

On board, daytime activities include swimming in one of two pools; lots of on-deck entertainment, games and tournaments; a club for kids; and lectures on art, food, health, beauty.

The nightlife aboard the Westerdam is varied. The Admiral Lounge plays host to Las Vegas-style productions and novelty acts. Other entertainment includes a 50s bash and a country and western party. Bands are plentiful and include dance bands, lounge acts, a string quartet and a calypso group.

The Westerdam also features theme cruises. Past entertainment included Budd Friedman's Improv at Sea, big band shows and a number of sock hops featuring favorite icons of the rock and roll era.

On land, the Westerdam's well-informed staff can organize affordable port excursions or offer valuable tips for those who prefer to explore on their own.

The half-day visit to Nassau allows passengers to sample the former British colony. Sights include Fort Charlotte, built in 1789 and Fort Fincastle, constructed in 1793. There's also Bay Street, the heart of the city, the Queen's Staircase, hand carved out of limestone by slaves, and Paradise Island, with its Cloister Gardens and famous Atlantic Resort and Casino.

The Westerdam's next stop is historic island of San Juan, which became part of the United States after the Spanish American War in 1898. The territory's residents became US citizens in 1917.

The seven-square-block area of Old San Juan, with its 16th and 17th century Spanish colonial architecture, has been named a National Historic Zone. Along the blue cobblestone roads are interesting churches, forts, museums, restored homes, duty-free boutiques, art galleries, restaurants and sidewalk cafes.

A popular Westerdam excursion is Juan Carlos and his Rumba Flamenco Show staged at the posh San Juan Grand Hotel. The famed Barcelona-born guitar master is remembered by many from his performances on The Ed Sullivan Show.

St. Thomas is one of the prettiest places on earth. A walking tour through downtown Charlotte Amalie should include a visit to Fort Christian, Government House and the St. Thomas Synagogue, the second oldest shul in the western hemisphere, built in 1833 by Sephardi Jews.

Other places of interest in St. Thomas are Coral World, Paradise Point Tramway, Estate St. Peter Greathouse and Botanical Gardens. Mountain Top. Of course, there are also St. Thomas' many beautiful beaches.

The MS Westerdam cruise-only fares range from $1,206 for a standard room to $5,189 for a spacious suite, based on double occupancy and including port charges. A number of 2-for-1 cruise are offered through travel agencies.

Canada 3000 also offers a flight schedule from Toronto.

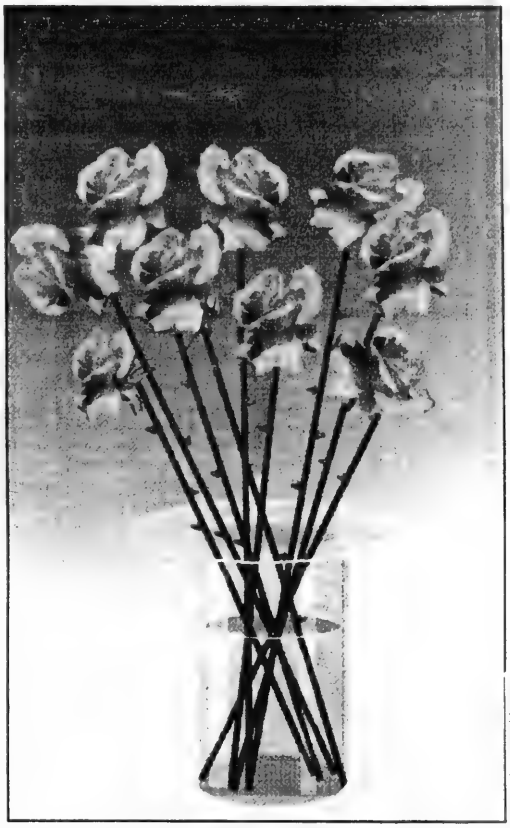
Millennium hype will affect floral themes this winter

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Student Intern



Every party needs a splash of color, pleasing patterns and relaxing fragrances. Why not borrow from nature?

Designs by Karen Baker (905-886-8100) is one example of an experienced florist studio. Baker, owner for 20 years, also deals with room decor, table props and party details. An expert in floral patterns, Baker knows exactly what flowers go with every affair.

For a wedding in June, she says, use hydragena, roses, peonies, cream-gold colors. Ice tones, like baby blue or pink, add some extra flair.

Summer, she says, favors cream and pastel colors. Roses offer an elegant classical look.

This winter will be buzzing with millennium hype, she says. Dragons, wizards and exotic or tropical flowers will be popular, as well as "funky sparkly flowers like protea, antherium or unusually colored orchids," she says.

Baker knows that everybody needs something different; some want major detail, some don't. But all the flowers have to be personable, have to touch the client in some special way.

A good florist is reputable, creative and enthusiastic, Baker says. The florist has to be prepared and organized, which includes coming on time.

"After all," she adds, "when it comes to bnei/bnot mitzvah, parents have waited 13 years for this."

Mario Seguin, owner of Floral Studio (504-1850) sees himself as a florist creating atmosphere for the whole evening. He works with lighting, staging and table setting. His studio is the official florist of the Canadian Opera Company and he arranged floral designs for the opening of the opera The Golden Ass.

"Shoppers should research for the best quality and price," he says. Seguin also believes a florist is someone the client can trust and get along with. Working with a florist should be, like the whole evening, a pleasant experience.

Floral Studio, which did $1 million of business last year, does weddings, charity events, galas and corporate affairs. Its clientele ranges from NHL all-star Paul Coffey to the Reichmans.

Many factors come into play when organizing a party with a florist, according to Baker.

"You have to consider such things as: Is there a theme? What are colors? Is it an elegant or fun display? How about the overall feeling of the room? Do you have linen covering the chairs?"

She suggests writing a formal proposal with different options, so everyone is aware of everything.

"I have a passion for it," says Seguin, on being a florist. "There's always something new and interesting to do."

DJs should provide creativity and interaction

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Student Intern

The beat is heavy. The bass shakes stomachs. Dancers gyrate and pull reluctant guests on stage.

DJs have taken over.

Innovative DJ services are catching on. More people want creativity and interaction at their parties, something they may not be able to get with a live band.

Freedom of Sound (905-760-0040) tries to be interactive without intimidating, according to owner Miki Klevan. His bar/bat mitzvah shows can include dancers, a DJ, an MC, a digital CD sound system, light shows, a 9x12 video screen and, if in the mood, fire-breathers and Henna painters. Klevan says that his company is one of the biggest in the Jewish market.

"We try to come up with different things that haven't been seen before," says Klevan.

Dancers could be an integral part of the show. Klevan thinks many dancers project an egotistical image of "I'm the best, I'm on a pedestal." Klevan's dancers grab guests by the hand to dance everything from the Macarena to the YMCA dance. Interaction with the crowd has no limits, he says.

Freedom of Sound hosted 700 to 800 parties last year and Klevan makes sure not one is the same. He tells the DJs to watch for kids they have seen before, so as to alter the routine for a different and fun experience. Weekly seminars train the dancers.

"Look for liability," suggests Klevan. "Look for a good name and someone that's reliable." DJ companies should have backups in case a performer falls ill or equipment damages during mid-show. Klevan finds that emergency vehicles loaded with sound gear are especially useful.

Rick Levine's Times Square Entertainment offers a Spice Party with Spice Girl lookalikes.

Rick Levine's Times Square Entertainment (905-881-6400) offers a high level of professionalism by avoiding tacky games and leaning towards a more musical oriented presentation.

He offers live band and DJ combinations, giving the best of both worlds. He finds a live band could be great but a DJ offers more versatility and an appeal to teens and adolescents.

"Volume and selection of music are important," says Levine, president of Times Square for five years. "You want to reach adults and kids with the style and repertoire. You don't play raunchy rock tunes with 70 percent senior citizens. Perhaps something more fun would be a conga line."

Levine's number one concern is that everyone feels comfortable at the party. Perhaps that is the reason, he says, why his company only books two parties a night–so the function will run smoothly and without problems.

We treat clients as equals, says Klevan. His agents give clients respect and attention because their event may be once-in-a-lifetime, and it must be special and innovative.

Book early, warns Levine. "We're booked into 2001. Don't worry–when you hire Times Square, we take care of the details."

Levine says his Jewish market is increasing, with 80 percent of business coming from Jewish functions.

Both DJ services offer casino games, laser systems and party packages.

DJs must be flexible

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Student Intern

Quality is the key factor for Jim Bailey, president of Ace Music Service (1-800-337-5530) for 18 years.

Hailed as the #1 DJ company in Thunder Bay, Ace has an office in Toronto and has hosted such events as the Pepsi Video Blast Party. Bar or Bat Mitzvahs run around $1000, depending on the options.

"Make sure you have a written contract," Bailey advises. "Ask for references, and make sure the company sends a competent DJ." Bailey suggests meeting the DJ personally before the evening, or perhaps viewing him perform.

Unsuccessful companies are inflexible, he says. They don't upgrade their equipment and the DJs may be over-bearing.

With Magic Moments (749-7604) , guests can expect professionalism, state-of-art equipment and an evening of magic, according to owner and operator Chris Allard.

"We're a smaller company," he says, "but our ambience is double than bigger DJ services".

Magic Moments offers DJs for sweet 16 birthday parties, anniversaries, Bar/Bat Mitzvahs, proms, weddings and corporate functions. Features include dry ice, fireworks, bubbles, intelligent lighting (computer controlled graphics) and elegant lighting for slow songs. That type of package may cost around $1500.

"DJs have to read the crowd," Allard says. "If they can't read the crowd, the night is shot."

Allard suggests not to pick the first company you see. There's always one better, he says, shop around. Remember, you pay for what you get.

Recently diving into the Bar Mitzvah market, Allard invested into traditional Jewish music. The music library ranges from the 20s to current tunes.

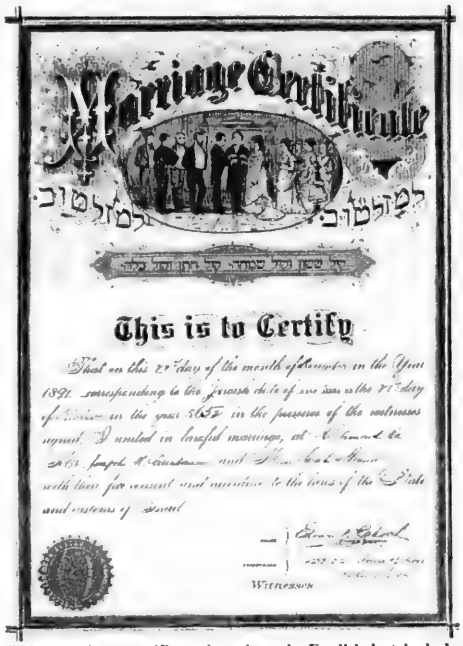
"We help plan the party, "Allard says. "We co-ordinate with staff from the hall, we work with the videographer and we all work together to get the function perfect."

Bailey constantly wishes to improve his DJ service. Follow-up calls to past clients offer insight into what was good and what needs change. He even offers a Web site [www.acetunz.com] for Internet users.

Allard offers a last piece of advice that could save headaches and financial woes.

"At the initial talk, ask every possible question. It's like buying a car, you don't want a lemon."

Other DJ's advertising in this supplement are: Mandell Entertainment Group, 886-4000; Mister Disc Jockey, 1-877-473-3800; Starr Productions, 881-1378.



This marriage certificate is written in English but includes traditional Hebrew verses that refer to marital happiness. A depiction of a ceremony is featured above the text. The bride was Sarah Strauss, and the groom was Joseph M. Rosenbaum. They married in Richmond, Va., 1891. Rabbi Edward Nathan Calisch officiated. This picture and the one on page 33 are taken from Ketubbot: Marriage Contracts from the Jewish Museum, edited by Claudia J. Nahson.

Many women want to look like Gwyneth Paltrow

Oscars set the tone in fashion

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

What people wear to the Academy Awards sets the tone for eveningwear for the coming year, says Edward Gurney of Julian Edwards (923-5979), a store that specializes in dresses for proms, weddings, bnai/bnot mitzvah or balls.

The company manufactures its products under the Peter Nou, Claire Pearce and Wayne Clark labels.

"After Gwyneth Paltrow appeared on the show in her pink, taffeta, a Ralph Lauren creation, we had many women coming in asking for something closely resembling it," he said.

Because they manufacture their own lines, he said, women can choose a dress they like, and have it made up for them in about three weeks. "We also do all the alterations on dresses that are chosen off the rack."

Full-length ball gowns are getting more and more popular every year, said Gurney. "There seem to be many events that call for these gowns, and people are feeling more comfortable about spending money.

"They're starting to go back to big skirts with miles and miles of tulle or taffeta that rustle when you walk."

Pink is the biggest color this spring, but black is the perennial favorite, he said. "If women want to wear a dress to many different occasions, I suggest they buy black or navy, because those colors are not as memorable.

"They can get a lot more mileage out of their dress, than, let's say, a bright pink dress."

Beading and sequins are coming back in a big way, he said. "The glitzier the better this year."

For cocktail dresses, which women wear for dinners, the theatre or to cocktail parties, glitzy is also popular, Gurney said.

"We're seeing a lot of shot taffeta, in which one color is woven one way, and another color is woven another way, producing an iridescent quality. For example, weaving together royal blue and black, gives off a sapphire effect."

The swing style is important this year, he said. "The dresses are ankle-length, with a simple bodice, short sleeves and boat neck.

"A narrow belt at the waist is made out of the same fabric as the dress. Taffeta, peau-de-soie or cotton linen blends are the more popular fabrics – any fabric that allows the skirt to move."

Every now and then, what's fashionable happens to be very wearable, and with the swing dresses "this is one of those moments," Gurney said.

"These swing dresses are easy to wear, not tight to the body. There are also a lot of seams so they are easy to alter.The dresses work for women of all ages."

For mothers of the bride, evening suits are very big, he said. These suits, with long skirts are often made of tri-acetate, a synthetic material that looks like four-ply silk.

"People are not buying the silk as much any more, because silk absorbs oil from the skin too easily and also pulls out of shape. Synthetics can approximate any fibre, they don't crease and sometimes, they can be thrown in the washing machine."

Bridesmaids, he said, are looking for dresses "that are not bridesmaidy. They want to be able to wear them again. We're seeing lots of blues, ivories, creams and pinks."

Other places providing fashion and accessories are: Celebration Shoes, 703-2789; Jordan's Apparel Ltd., 667-1175; Toni Plus, 512-0341.

Combine friendship and crafts at innovative party places

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Many celebrations need a sizable venue like a hall, hotel or larger restaurant to host a few hundred people. For smaller parties, though, many small, out-of-the-ordinary venues offer unique, one-of-a-kind ways to have fun.

To sample two such venues, let's look at Rosie's House of Ceramics (222-3808), and the Academy of Artisans (322-9997). Both invite you to combine creativity in a craft or art with a gathering of close friends or family celebrating together.

Rosie's House of Ceramics is a home studio, where you make a ceramic piece for yourself or as a gift. It's ideal for gatherings up to about 16 people, such as a shower for the friends of a bride. Along with coffee, cookies and candies, Rosie supplies tools and brushes.

You start work with a bisque, a piece which has already been shaped and fired once in the kiln at 1200 F. Though you paint and glaze the bisque yourself, you don't take it home right away: it has to be fired again. The finished piece is durable and useful: you can clean it in the dishwasher, or use it to heat food in the microwave.

Much of the pleasure of working with ceramics is in the contrast between fragility and earthy strength.

Many forms of ceramics shatter easily, or lose their glaze if subjected to extreme heat or corrosive cleaning. This fragility challenges us to treat a beautiful material object with loving care.

Yet, if treated well, a bowl or plate is an enduring memento. Ceramics last for decades, even millennia. When archeologists study an ancient culture, one of the first things they look at is the pottery.

Rosie's House of Ceramics also offers regular workshops. (Serious long-term students buy their own tools.) Whether for party or workshop, Rosie is always your resource person, there to help you.

The Academy of Artisans offers crafts ranging from metalwork to macramé: cooking, papier mâché, cartooning, tie dye, silk screening, stained glass, mask making, pottery, drawing and painting. And the same 56 professionals teach at both the parties and regular classes.

The academy can also host other courses like origami and jewelry making.

Recently, a book club did floor cloths; and a bar mitzvah party did dogtag jewelry.

Your academy event lasts two hours, 1½ for the activity and 30 minutes for celebration. You can provide food or let the academy cater. It also supplies free helium balloons, and will work with party themes.

The academy can host up to 30 or 35 children, and also go off-site for bigger events, to a hall or club, as part of a larger entertainment context.

Book a month or so ahead, Rosie advises. The academy can handle short- notice bookings, but it's better to book as far ahead as you can.

This marriage contract from Pisa, Italy from 1721 celebrates the marriage between Sarah Miranda and Moses De Leon. The nudes at the top indicate the influence of Italian art.

Simplistic and traditional gowns are both popular

Elenis Papourlias of Elenis Coutourie and Tailor works on everything from bridal gowns to suits.

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Student Intern

Style, body shape and budget should be considered when shopping for bridal fashion, says two leading experts in the business.

Elenis Papourlias, of Elenis Coutourie and Tailor (657-1286), works on everything from bridal gowns to suits. She feels that if a bride has a style in mind, then designing the fashion may make the job easier.

"Clients have to trust me," says Papourlias. "In this business, it's not good for the reputation to lie."

Budget is important, she says, because the client must know what she can afford and what will suit her needs.

From her Keele and Eglinton home, Papourlias uses fabrics like four-ply crepe silk, peu de soir silk and wool for suits. Custom gowns average $1500, a polyester bridesmaid gown starts at $385 and a two-piece suit for mothers starts at $700 (depending on the fabric).

Nilda Chiarelli, of Edith's Fashions (633-4222), says the 8000 sq. ft. store has a large selection of bridal wear, cocktail suits, evening gowns and sportswear. She tends to use chiffon, satin and silk fabrics.

Chiarelli says a recent trend in bridal fashion is simplicity.

"Also," she adds, "the open neckline and short sleeves are popular."

The gown or dress must suit the woman's body, she says, so it will highlight the curves and the contours.

Papourlias finds that antique colours are coming back. Colours like beige, off-white, light blue, and washed-out green are requested more often. She sees a surge of low-cut, long dresses with slits.

"Brides want something they can wear again," says Papourlias.

While women want something more simplistic, Papourlias is also seeing a comeback of the Victorian style gowns.

"Maybe it's those Shakespeare movies," she speculates. "But I'm getting more customers who want big, Cinderella gowns."

Papourlias stresses that comfort should be the most important factor when shopping for bridal fashion. If it doesn't fit right, don't buy it.

"I also believe that you pay for what you get," Papourlias says. "For a fancy large gown, expect a higher price. For a smaller gown, expect a smaller price."

Other factors that women should consider include good service, workmanship, fabric durability and availability of in-store alterations.

Vilda Chiarelli of Edith's Fashions has bridalwear, cocktail suits, evening gowns and sportswear.

A lot can happen between hors d'oeuvres and dessert. We'll see to it.

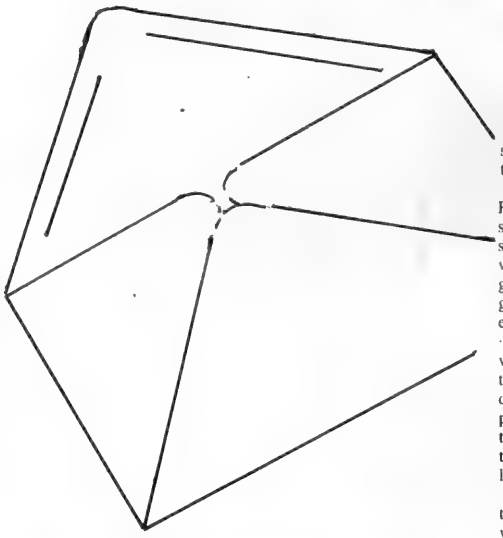
Party Planner



You're invited!

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

Invitations are designed to do the obvious – what, where and when, says Ann Feldman, who owns the Printed Word (484-4600) with her husband Eliot.

Invitations also set the tone of the party, she says. "Whether it is a backyard party or a black-tie event, the invitation can say it all.

"If an invitation is glitzy, with stars, bows and bangles, guests know it is going to be a glitzy event. On the other hand, a traditional invitation written in formal font, sets the tone for a traditional affair."

An invitation that had a picture of a tree on it, was for a party being held outside. "It put people in the mood for the party."

Clients have several options when they come to see her, she says. "We can order from a catalogue, or we can invent the wheel. They then have a choice of paper and a choice of offset printing or engraving."

Engraving is the most expensive because a metal plate has to be produced, and is usually done for "classic, traditional weddings. The invitations are usually white or off-white with black or charcoal-grey print. Guests know the wedding will be, not necessarily black tie, but traditional and formal."

More casual affairs call for cards with imprinted borders. "If kids are being taken to a sports place, the invitation can have a sports theme. A dance party can be announced using a jukebox theme. These cards are printed by computer or offset [printing]."

Japanese handmade papers have become quite popular. "Some are thin and tissue-like, and others have a design ingrained in the paper. They are much more textured than regular paper. They are often used as a top layer of an invitation," says Feldman, "to make the invitation demure."

Cynthia Sager, owner of Please Reply (905-508-5669) says that some people like their guests to be surprised. "They may keep the invitation simple, but the affair is going to be quite elaborate. The guests do not know what to expect."

Simple invitations can be converted easily, she says. "Add a bow, turn down a corner, and you've dressed it up. You can also use a paper with flecks, textures, tone on tone or with a weave coming through the paper. Ideas are limitless."

Bar or bat mitzvah invitations tend to be simpler than wedding invitations, she says. "They are usually for parties rather than for more traditional affairs."

When deciding when to order invitations, says Feldman, she advises her clients to work backwards. "Figure out when the event is, when you want it mailed, and how long it will take to have the invitations made. We suggest that summer invitations be sent out about two months ahead, so people can plan their holidays. Too early is not good because people may put the invitations away and forget about them."

Some people send out notes a few months ahead that an invitation will be coming and people should mark the date. "One client wrote a note in her Jewish New Year cards."

She also tells her clients not to time the mailing so the invitations come out before a major holiday such as Passover or Rosh Hashanah. "They may get lost in the shuffle of holiday preparation."

Yiddish is alive and well in Israeli theatre

By SARAH HERSHENSON
WZPS

It is remarkable that in Israel, where Hebrew is the proudly spoken language, Yiddish is alive and well, both on the street and in the theatre. As the Tel Aviv based Yiddishpiel theatre troupe celebrates its tenth anniversary, with sold out performances in Israel and abroad, it is apparent that, even today, Yiddish for Jews everywhere is more than just a language.

Many identify with its nuances, its gestures, the irrepressible cadence of its words, and the tuneful melodies of songs that burst from a vibrant soul. It is representative of the life and culture of the ghetto – the strivings, hardships and joys.

"We are celebrating so many achievements," says Shmuel Atzmon, Yiddishpiel's artistic director. "Our anniversary celebration program, Gut Yom Tov, Yiddish (Happy Holiday, Yiddish) celebrates both 50 years of the State of Israel and the 10th anniversary of the Yiddishpiel, and we honor them both.

"The show opens and closes with the entire cast in glittering evening dresses and tuxedos, setting the stage for a festive evening of song, monologues, comedy, and short skits that fill the heart with nostalgia and joy."

The show was so successful that Gut Yom Tov, Yiddish was performed in November at the Tel Aviv Opera House to a sold out audience, and videotaped and screened outside for the hundreds of people unable to obtain tickets.

Yiddish, a hallmark of European Jewish culture, was not always looked upon kindly in Israel. Rather, there was a period when it was held in disdain because it represented the life and hardships of the ghetto.

In 1929, the famous Yiddish actress, Molly Picon, travelled to what was then called Palestine where instead of cheers, she was welcomed with jeers and insults. Only after the intervention of Israel's poet laureate, Haim Nachman Bialik, did her show go on.

On Sept. 8, 1930, things took a turn for the worse when a notice appeared in the Israeli press that cinemas were not allowed to show Yiddish films. In 1951, it became a criminal offense for a native-born Israeli to perform in Yiddish!

In the '60s, many new performers in Israel, like Atzmon, who made aliyah from Romania, drifted between the fledgling Hebrew theatre and the small Yiddish stage. As a matter of fact, Atzmon flatly states that during those years he was the leader of the "storm and fury" of the avant-garde Hebrew theatre.

Now he has returned to his roots and the Yiddish stage. He feels that people are coming back to the Yiddish theatre because they've had enough of the "salt, pepper and vinegar" of plays that deal critically with society. "We lost a lot of the soul of those years of Hebrew drama," he reflects. "Now we are trying to bring the public back."

Even though the formal prohibitions against Yiddish were removed in the '70s, the biggest boon to Yiddish took place in 1979 when Isaac Bashevis Singer, whose books were written in Yiddish, was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature. This recognition of the beauty of the Yiddish language provided a "transfusion" for the Yiddish theatre.

"Just as Isaac Bashevis Singer said that he would keep writing in Yiddish for the lone Jew who would arise from the grave in the day of Messiah and ask for I.B. Singer's latest book in Yiddish," quips Atzmon, "so we will continue Yiddishpiel theatre performances."

Yiddishpiel was formed with the aid and encouragement of former Tel Aviv mayor, Shlomo Lahat, towards the end of 1987. "Today, 10 years on, we sell over 50,000 tickets per year," says Rachel Limon, president of the Friends of Yiddishpiel.

"We do some 60 performances throughout Israel every year, in addition to 80 performances in our super, modern, home theatre in Tel Aviv's ZOA House, which was donated in 1989 by Americans Cecil and Leon Fiszman.

Desserts you can't refuse

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

If you're thinking of sending birthday or holiday wishes, or a gift for a special occasion, why not say it with chocolate?

Chocolate Charm (787-4256) at 3541 Bathurst Street specializes in chocolate truffles, novelty- shaped chocolates, gift baskets and trays. "We make gift-giving deliciously easy. That's our motto," says store owner Bob Levine.

In operation since 1983, Chocolate Charm, which is under COR supervision, offers both milk and pareve chocolates made from Swiss and Belgian chocolate, says Levine.

Belgium and Switzerland make the best chocolate in the world, Levine says. "There's no American chocolate that can come close. If you're a real connoisseur you can tell that the European chocolate is smoother and melts in your mouth."

Chocolate novelty shapes, which Chocolate Charm can personalize and deliver, make wonderful gifts because they're something people would not buy for themselves, Levine says.

"It's more of a fun thing. It's nice to get the shape they like in chocolate...If you like hockey and you get a chocolate hockey stick it's really fun."

He says during the holidays, novelty shapes are very popular gifts. At Shavuot, for example, people like to give chocolate-shaped Torahs and tablets and for Rosh Hashanah there are chocolate shofars and apples.

Chocolate flowers have also become very popular. Long stem roses, daisies, tulips and daffodils sent in clay pots make wonderful house-warming and holiday gifts, says Levine. "Our flowers don't wilt."

He says personalized chocolate champagne bottles are also frequently requested as gifts for special occasions. He recommends that customers give the store a day's notice for personalized items.

Levine says people love to get chocolate as gifts because it "is known to be the most universally loved flavor."

At Chocolate Charm two full-time chocolate makers are on staff at all times, and they don't use any preservatives or artificial flavors, he says. "Our truffles are made with fresh cream, real butter and genuine liqueurs."

Truffles, he explains, have a soft creamy centre which is encased in a chocolate shell.

Chocolate Charm also has a line of Passover and pareve truffles. Brandied cherry, a maraschino cherry marinated in brandy, dipped in fondant and then in chocolate, is one of the most popular truffles. Other truffle flavors in demand include caramel, champagne, Kahlua, Scotch, Irish cream, cappuccino and café au lait.

Chocolate-covered nuts, almond bark in milk or dark chocolate, and dry fruit dipped in chocolate are also available.

A treat from Chocolate Charm.

Levine says that research shows that chocolate is good for you. "Almond bark is a nice, healthy snack and is not bad for the heart. The oil in chocolate is unsaturated. Chocolate is of vegetable origin."

Chocolate Charm has been making smash cakes from the same European chocolate since the late '80s.

A smash cake is a hollow chocolate box in the shape of a cake which the bar/bat mitzvah breaks with a mallet. "We decorate the cake with all kinds of shapes. We add their names in chocolate with the letters standing up and we provide a mallet.

"We have a few hundred different shapes – telephones, polar bears, elephants. It's all made out of chocolate."

For more traditional cakes and other luscious desserts for simchas, consider Sweet York (783-4293), the dessert division of Caterers York, the caterers of Pride of Israel and Beth Tzedec synagogues. The company provides cakes to many synagogues and hotels.

Sweet York, now operating for 16 years, was established because catering company co-owners Sharon Firestone and Bill Batista felt there were not enough "good quality pareve desserts." They also wanted to custom design wedding cakes and special occasion cakes, says Firestone.

Cakes need not be adorned with the traditional bride and groom figurines: some people even use fresh flowers, she says.

She notes that Sweet York's cake designer, Linda Thomas, can custom-design more intricate cakes. The wedding and bar/bat mitzvah cakes come in a variety of flavors – carrot, lemon. mocha, and chocolate mousse, to name but a few. Bar/bat mitzvah cakes can also be coordinated with a theme or color scheme, she adds.

Some frequently requested desserts from Sweet York include what Firestone calls "the best chocolate chip cookies," chocolate mousse tortes, chocolate pecan flans, and fruit flans.

For sweet tables, the company prepares an assortment of mini pastries, squares, cookies, and 9-inch cakes, she says.

"We can be very creative. I always liked to bake at home. I wanted to do some of my own recipes [for the simchas]."

She says she has experimented and been able to adapt recipes for quantity as well as for kashrut. "Many new recipes can be adapted to make them pareve."

She says desserts go in and out of fashion. For example, biscotti, an Italian cookie very similar to mandel broit is very popular these days, as are apple desserts. "Fruit generally is more in vogue because there is a trend to lighter and healthier eating.

Time to say good riddance to bad hair days

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

You can say good riddance to bad hair days, if you follow the advice of hairstylists John Colombo and Marc Anthony.

Colombo is the owner of Hairafter, located at 644 Finch Ave., between Bayview and Leslie (221-6658).

Hairafter, which has been at this location for 28 years, is a full- service hair salon offering make-up, manicures, facials and other esthetic services.

The shape of the face determines the hairstyle, Colombo says. His philosophy has always been to match the suitability of the style to the shape of the face. "I'm a firm believer in suitability. Hair is like clothes in that way."

For example, he says that a person with a square face can wear an updo "beautifully" and a person with a long face shouldn't wear long hair down. "I would suggest some curls to get volume along the side. You start to look in proportion. You go with width rather than height."

A little bit of bangs usually suits a round face and hair can be worn either up or down, Colombo says.

On the other hand, long hair does not suit a triangular nor a diamond shape. He suggests that a person with this shaped face "can be fairly adventurous and can try an asymmetric hairstyle."

Hairafter uses sketches to determine the client's face shape. Before a cut there is a consultation with every client."The consultation is very important. The client should not have any surprises. Communication between the client and hairdresser is very important.

"Hair plays the first role before clothes. When you look at someone, you look them in the eye. You see the face and the hair frames the face."

For special occasions Hairafter stylists can do updos, knotting and crimping, Colombo says. "For brides I recommend natural flowers for their hair."

He uses orchids frequently, but the type of flower used in the hair depends on the bride's dress. The salon also has a wide selection of hair ornaments, he adds.

As for trends, he says that short hair has been in style for the last few years. Hair tends to be shorter in the summer and then longer in the fall and winter.

He notes the trend for wispier bangs, created by a double layer of bangs – the layer underneath is shorter – which gives the impression of "a see-through kind of veil."

A bob (cut) is a look "that will never die," Colombo says. "There are so many versions of the bob and pageboy. There's a lot of versatility."

As for layered hair, he notes that a lot of texturing is done with a razor to get more volume and softness. The trend now is for layers to be shoulder-length with "the layering on the perimeter, not on the top."

Colombo says that soft perms are very fashionable. "The look today is very versatile. We're going back to the '40s with waves and soft curls."

Hairafter also specializes in hair color – highlighting, lowlighting, colorshine etc. – offering their clientele a full range of haircoloring techniques.

To achieve a more natural look with color, he recommends choosing a shade or two lighter than one's natural color.

Hair shining, a color treatment without ammonia or peroxide that lasts four to six weeks, can be used for people who have less than 30 percent grey hair, he says. "It brings out the natural color."

Marc Anthony, as he prefers to be called, owns two full service salons bearing his

The Marc Anthony salons won the 1998 Canadian Hair Color Championship at the Allied Beauty Association of Canada show and was designated the 1999 salon team of the year, by Canadian Hairdresser Magazine, Marc Anthony says proudly.

He also manufactures a line of hair care products under the Marc Anthony label, which is now available across Canada at Shoppers Drug Mart stores. "It is the only true professional product available for consumers at Shoppers," says Marc Anthony.

He says that there are several new hair-coloring trends this spring.

With hair shading, the last two inches of hair are colored about two shades lighter than the rest of the hair. Depending on the personality, the shading can be even lighter for a greater contrast, he explains.

His technicians are very skilled in all types of coloring techniques. Highlighting and lowlighting give more volume to the hair with a much more natural look, he explains.

He says when you combine low-lighting, – going a few shades darker – with highlighting – going a few shades lighter – it replicates the variations in the color-shading of natural hair.

Hair should also have a beautiful healthy shine without split ends, Marc Anthony says. As hair grows longer it gets drier and you can see the difference between the new growth at the roots, which is full of moisture, compared with the ends which are often dry and split.

"We set out to create a product, the Marc Anthony Moisture Gloss Serum, which replenishes essential hair moisture."

He strongly recommends the use of this product to return natural moisture to hair for people who straighten their hair. "The Moisture Gloss Serum should be used when you blow-dry curls to straighten them. You need the extra moisture. Use it and your hair will be silky."

For fine and flat hair he suggests using Marc Anthony Hair-Thickening Cream because "it's heat-activated. When you blow-dry the hair, the heat activates the molecules to expand the hair temporarily to make the hair strand thicker and give the hair a fuller look."

Marc Anthony technicians can also add more volume to hair using a roller wave technique. This technique adds body rather than curl, and gives the hair a lift, lasting up to four months.

For frizzy hair he recommends a curl enhancer/frizz control product called Marc Anthony Jel Lite. "It seals in the frizz and individualizes the curl for beautiful and healthy looking curls with shine."

Hairafter uses sketches to determine client's face shape.

Marc Anthony hair products are available commercially.

Digital cameras a wonderful tool for the amateur

By RICK LEVINE
Special to The CJN

Have you ever brought a camera to an event thinking you would have some great pics only to be disappointed with results when they came back from the lab? Well it's time to join the world of digital photography.

Digital cameras are devices that do not use film, but instead capture images on various types of memory cards (Smart Media of Compact Flash), which are then viewed on a computer or printed out on a high- quality color printer. The results can be stunning!

Family functions, weddings, bar/bat mitzvahs will offer great opportunities to capture lots of color and action.

Combine the digital images with a personal computer, a software editing program and a little creative energy, and you might surprise yourself, as well as your relatives and friends.

Digital photography has many advantages.

Most digital cameras today have built-in screens, which allow immediate viewing of the pictures. You can quickly remove any pictures that turn out poorly or the ones you simply don't wish to keep.

With digital cameras, one selects a resolution, and this determines the number of pictures on the memory card. A single card can hold more than 100 pictures.

You can copy the images to your computer, burn them to CD ROM, or put them on the internet for relatives and friends to see.

You are able to view your pictures, as soon as you get home from the party.

There are many different cameras. I have tried the latest line of Digital photography has many advantages over traditional way

Olympus digital cameras. I found the Olympus D-400 or the Olympus D-620L zoom lens cameras easy to use and I was happy with the images captured.

Are the digital/inkjet prints as good as traditional photos? Using the special glossy paper, the printer can yield beautifully finished prints without visible pixels.

The Olympus cameras and the Epson printers reviewed are designed to work with both Windows and Macintosh computer platforms. I used them with a Power Macintosh.

I appreciated the convenience of the Olympus Flashpath adapter, which enables the Smart Media card to transfer the digital images through the floppy drive quickly and onto the computer's hard drive.

This may seem a little technical but it's easier than it sounds, and certainly beats the older method of using serial cables to transfer the camera's images to the computer.

All this digital technology has come a long way in the last few years and continues to evolve at a staggering pace with more remarkable, faster, better products every six months.

Nothing, however, will replace the person taking the picture, which is why hiring a professional photographer to record the memories of an important family event is something that a computer can never replace.

And the time will come in the not-too-distant future, when professional photographers will be able to capture your special day entirely with digital equipment.

Record the memories with a digital camera for your own enjoyment and hire a professional photographer for your own piece of mind.

The pictures on this and the preceeding page were taken by an amateur photographer using a digital Olympus camera. You should see them in color!!

Lots of variety to jewelry

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Student Intern

Have you ever felt that a gift of jewellry may be predictable, boring and repetitive?

There's endless variety, say two jewellry experts. Renée Ackermann, of The Earring Gallery (905-763-2210) and Randee Clayman of Tollman Fine Jewellery (905-707-8006) deal with silver, gold and precious stones every working day.

The Earring Gallery houses over 3,000 pairs of earrings, from clip-ons to diamond studs, says Ackermann. Many earrings come from Italy, Israel or the States, starting at $30 per pair and reaching a maximum of $5,000.

"We work closely with each person," says Ackermann. "We guide them to whatever they want to spend and make them feel comfortable."

Ackermann finds that a brand called Huggie is very popular these days. These earrings have a hinge that opens and closes, "hugging" the earlobe. It is very small but comfortable, she says, and doesn't have anything sticking in the back of the neck.

Earrings are a popular gift choice for bat mitzvahs. For a 12-year-old girl, Ackermann says, you don't want to buy anything heavy or elaborate. A chai or Magen David ornament is popular, as is the silver-gold combination from the Israeli merchandise. Pearls are also making a comeback, with colors ranging from white to black to pink, she says. Pearls are abundant during weddings or bridal showers.

Graphic by Edward Dunbar

Try on the earrings before purchasing, Ackermann suggests. Don't worry, the Earring Gallery sterilizes every pair after every use.

Skin color and face shape plays into it, Ackermann says. Long faces are usually complimented by round earrings and vice versa. For pale skin, colored stones usually brighten the face and white or yellow gold stands out naturally on a dark-toned face.

"Trust your jeweller," Ackermann advises. "Feel confident that he or she is reputable and honest."

Clayman, of Tollman Fine Jewellery which just opened in February, has gifts like rings, wedding bands, sterling silver items, pearls and earrings.

She says that diamond pendants are desirable.

"They look amazing on any age group."

Clayman says they have unusual white gold rings, even Magen David rings that start as low as $50. For spring, pearls are definitely in, she adds.

People are buying a lot of cubic zirconium, she says. It is not a real diamond but is cut and faceted to sparkle like the real thing. Also, she adds, the cost of cubic zirconium may be more practical for some people.

"Have a budget in mind so you won't be easily swayed," advises Clayman. "Ask questions about everything; it's like buying a car, it's an investment."

"Anything's possible," Ackermann says. "If we don't have the earrings you're looking for, we can order earrings from our supplier or have them custom-made."

It is essential for a gift store to have something for everyone. It must have a calm environment and reputable staff that stand behind the product, Clayman says.

Many identify with Yiddish nuances, gestures and irrepressible cadences

To aid audience enjoyment, we received a donation of some $25,000 from Abraham Lerner from England to provide simultaneous translation headphone devices that enable our audiences to enjoy Yiddish plays in Hebrew and in English."

Over the years, Yiddishpiel has staged 27 different productions and participated in 12 international festivals. Just as audience members comprise three generations, so, too, do the actors involved in Yiddish theatre. In 1995, Yiddishpiel opened its first Studio for Young Actors, and 14 new, young actors participated in 480 hours of professional instruction in the Yiddish language, culture and acting techniques. In 1997, they performed their own successful production of The Romanian Wedding and have since become involved in the troupe's professional performances.

Weddings occupy a special place in Yiddish plays. The Romanian Wedding, for example, is the favorite of actor Carol Marcovitz, who performed for 22 years in over 120 different roles with the Yiddish theatre in Bucharest.

"The Yiddish theatre is so successful and desirable in Romania its actors and actresses are mostly non-Jews," he says. "It's wonderful for me to be in Israel and perform in the mameloshen before Jewish audiences and with Jewish actors."

A special honor

Actress Monica Wardimon, who plays the female lead in The Romanian Wedding, agrees. She came to Israel from Romania in 1976, after being a star performer on the Yiddish stage and Romanian television. "Performing with the Yiddishpiel is a special honor," she says.

"The stories in the Yiddish theatre are, perhaps, naive with bitter-sweet humor, pathos, and side-splitting belly-laughs," says Atzmon with a wry smile. "But that is life. Jews are not connoisseurs of caviar. We are connoisseurs of schmaltz with a touch of garlic, like Yiddish stories.

"Writers like Shalom Aleichem, whose many stories we have adapted for stage, wrote with a lot of schmaltz. But he knew how to put it in the right places. Schmaltz is healthy if you know how to use it."

Writer and Yiddish performer, Morris Schwartz, certainly knew how to use it when he wrote The Drunken Chazan, a monologue currently being performed by Marcovitz. It is the story of a once-famous cantor who stops singing in the synagogue, because he feels that people are more concerned with money and prestige, than in helping his sick daughter.

After she dies he makes a vow never to sing again, but he does express hope that, when the children come to shul on Simchat Torah, things will improve.

His last words to Yankele, to whom he tells the story, and who personifies the audience and the Jewish people, are "Zei gezunt, (be well)." This is exactly what audiences worldwide wish the Yiddishpiel in this special anniversary year.

Lake Placid celebration pays homage to first Jewish community

By MARK SMITH
Special to the CJN

David Cohen

They were an unlikely group of men to be traversing the great Adirondack wilderness of northern New York State.

They were hardly men at all. Mostly teenage boys – some as young as 13 and 14 – they were Jewish refugees from Europe, plodding on foot across the rugged terrain with 100-pound packs on their backs, looking to make friends and looking to make a sale.

This summer, when the small synagogue congregation in the fashionable Winter Olympic resort of Lake Placid celebrates its 120th year, it will also pay homage to those extraordinary individuals who brought the first Jewish community to this still-remote backwater of mountain and forest.

Today, that community represents the last active synagogue congregation in an area larger than Rhode Island and Connecticut put together.

Until recent decades, the Adirondacks was almost the exclusive preserve of French-Canadian lumberjacks, Yankee wilderness guides, fur trappers, miners and a few hard-working farmers. Much of the region today remains as inaccessible as it was more than a century ago, when those early Adirondack Jews schlepped along its old tracks and cow paths to wherever a dwelling could be found.

They were a tough breed of youngsters, pioneer-merchants, peddlers, walking sometimes up to their knees in mud and snow. Communities and farmhouses were so isolated, it could take a boy half a day to trudge between them.

Winter nights were bitterly cold, with the thermometer sinking to 40 degrees below zero.

But life in the Adirondacks was a far cry from the cold-water tenements of New York City's Lower East Side. Although still decades shy of peak Eastern European immigration, Manhattan slums already thronged with immigrant Jewish families, industrious and hopeful in their new "Golden Land," but crippled by poverty.

A peddler's life in this northern wilderness, however hard, was a blessing – at least compared to hawking matches, a penny a box, around the rough saloons of Hell's Kitchen or slaving in the sweatshops of the industrial revolution.

Between 1830 and 1914, nearly three million Jews left central and eastern Europe. During those years, more than a million of them landed on the docks and quays of New York's harbors. Most stayed in New York City itself.

Others went west; others, north to Montreal, Toronto and other places where great centres of Canadian Jewry exist today.

But there were also those who settled in the great wilderness in between. Jewish roots in the Adirondacks go back to the early decades of the 19th century. Jews — mostly immigrants from Germany —worked as furriers' agents in the old trapping colony of Old Forge, on the south-west fringes of the wilderness. Others are known to have worked briefly in the iron mines.

Stories also persist of Polish immigrants in 1890s – Jews among them – being shanghaied to build the new rail-link between Remsen and Montreal. But ages-old anti-Semitism was fervent among Polish Catholics, and some of those Jews are thought to have fled into the wild Adirondacks. To survive, they peddled.

The first Jewish peddlers here arrived in the late 1830s, on the heels of the first logging boom. Although none are known to have settled among the wild mountains and forests, there were burgeoning Jewish communities in the small cities on the rim of the wilderness.

As early as 1844, there was already a synagogue and a well-established Jewish population in Plattsburgh, on the north-east edge of the Adirondacks. Historic records from the city of Utica, show 140 Jews registered as licensed peddlers between 1849 and 1871. Some are certain to have traveled into the remote hinterland of the region.

Many of the names of Jewish peddlers have become local legend, etched into Adirondack folklore by those who recall the tales of their parents and grandparents. Yet there is no mention of these people in any of the classic Adirondack histories.

There was Zip Coon (probably Cohen), who worked out of Albany, coming by train to North Creek and Mazel Tov, It's a girl! So...when's the Wedding?

By RICK LEVINE
Special to The CJN

Simchah planning for the people of our community has always been a major event. It's a responsibility. In fact, it's a tradition!

Among the many changes over the decades, musical styles have varied, food presentation has developed and prices have gone in one direction. But most significantly, it's the people who have changed and the technology that has improved.

In response to the needs of this community, an industry that services the wedding, bar and bat mitzvah market has seen unprecedented growth.

The early decades of this century saw a significant wave of Jewish immigration to North America and with them came the tastes and styles of eastern Europe. They were determined to work hard to provide a new life for their children, but life was hard and there were few luxuries. with the life they never had.

As the community grew more prosperous, the wedding and the bar/bat mitzvah began to take on a special significance. Mother and father would reserve the shul, have the most beautiful invitations, order the best kosher meal, find the finest florists, reserve the best photographer and hire a fabulous orchestra.

Mom and Dad had complete control. In the early days, there were only a limited number of businesses who were equipped to supply the appropriate type of service.

How things have changed! Today many people hold their functions outside of the shuls. Some people design their own invitations on the computer, meals are not always kosher, and memories are now often, captured on video as well as still photography.

Kids make the choices

DJs compete with orchestras, and more often than not, the kids make the choices.

For their bar/bat mitzvahs, the kids want the DJs they see performing at their summer camps. The kids want to hear all the latest songs they hear on the radio.

Today, kids think that having a DJ at a bar/bat mitzvah is cooler than having a band. For many parents, the cost of a DJ is enough of a savings over hiring an orchestra to warrant putting up with all this "noise."

Unless they are paying for the simchah, most grandparents have very little say anymore and will come simply as guests to share the moment with family and friends. In most cases, gone is the day when you will hear a tango, waltz, cha cha or polka played at a simchah.

What we have seen, particularly at weddings, is a change in the variety of musical styles. Weddings will usually have an orchestra rather than a DJ. We can find dozens of genuine bands specializing in particular styles of music, such as klezmer, Middle Eastern or Russian, to fulfill the needs of the members of these communities.

Since today both parents work, there is a real need for a professional party consultant to eliminate the stress of planning a big simchah. Party planning consultants are readily available to help a person plan and organize each and every detail. In recent years, party planners are in far greater demand.

If you are old enough to remember the 8mm movie camera, you'll have a great appreciation for the invention of the video camera. Since 1980, video has become as common as still photography as a way of recording the events of that special day. But since the introduction of video, there have been tremendous improvements in quality and production.

The first video cameras required a lot of lighting in order to obtain a clear picture. Cameras have improved to enable videographers to work totally in the background, nearly unnoticed. Many photography studios now offer video services, greatly adding to the competitiveness of that area of the market.

Decor has always been an important party of setting the mood for an event. Chair covers are increasingly popular today, as some of the halls only have very plain commercial type chairs.

Looking at a before and after photograph of the same hall set up with chair covers and without chair covers will allow one to appreciate the dramatic difference. For that matter, some halls need more work than others to help set the mood.

It might be worth while to visit the hall with your decorator to determine what degree of decoration will be required to meet your needs.

Balloon arches are still popular at bar/bat mitzvahs, and floral arrangements add elegance to weddings. Our city has an abundance of very talented decorators which makes this area of the market also very competitive.

The Toronto Jewish community has experienced unprecedented growth over the past 20 years, due in part to a large migration of people from the Montreal area, South Africa and the Middle East. In addition to increasing the size of the market place, these people have also brought with them an abundance of talented professionals and entrepreneurs who specialize in providing a tremendous variety of services.

Celebration pays homage to first Jewish community

then plodding on by foot to the Blue Mountain Lake area in the central Adirondacks.

There were the Cohen brothers, David and Moses, of Bloomingdale, who worked a route along the Saranac River. There was George Baroudi, of North Creek, and Moses Ginsberg, who worked out of Lake Placid and later Tupper Lake.

Their packs were enormous. The main pack – made from mattress ticking and stretching from the shoulders to the calves – carried 70-odd pounds of heavy goods – tinware, pots and pans, underwear, checkered tablecloths, stockings, ladies' wrappers. The front portion, called a telescope, was strapped around the waist and held an additional 25 pounds of lighter items, like elastic, pins, buttons; sometimes medicine and insurance.

Ready-made peddler packs came by train to North Creek or Plattsburgh from a supplier in New York City, and could be purchased from accompanying agents for between $16 and $30. There are tales of the kindness of these agents, who would often let a boy peddler have a pack on loan, sometimes out of their own pockets. Stories also persist of the determination of peddlers to repay those loans.

They got to know the community, mostly the women of the households – the wives of lumberjacks, long-suffering women who waited all year for a fat paycheck, and the wives of farmers, whose husbands would spend all day in the rocky fields.

And the peddlers brought the news of the day from neighbors as they made the rounds. These peddlers also acted as supply agents to wilderness guides, the men who took New York City's elite – the J.P. Morgans, Rockefellers and Vanderbilts – on hunting and fishing excursions into the bush.

Among those elite, also came Manhattan's Jewish millionaires – men like financier Otto Kahn and copper magnate Adolph Lewisohn, who not only took guides into the woods, but also personal barbers and singing teachers. These were interesting times in the Adirondacks.

But there was another side to it. Muriel Ginsberg, now 90, the daughter of a peddler named Moses Ginsberg, and one of only a handful of Jews to have remained in the once-thriving Jewish community of Tupper Lake, remembers her father's tales of dog bites, shotgun blasts that almost blew his head off and of suspicious husbands who would come home and "throw out the Jew."

She said sometimes, there would be a sign: "No dogs. No peddlers." and sometimes it read: "No dogs. No Jews." She said her father was very young when he was peddling.

"I remember him telling me of one incident when a drunken husband threw him out in the middle of the night. The house was just across from a graveyard.

"He saw shadows dancing on the headstones in the moonlight, and was convinced they were ghosts. He ran and ran. He told me he was shaking for hours after that."

Moses Ginsberg later went on to open up the Ginsberg department store in Tupper Lake. He died in 1974, and the department store, the longest-lasting family-run department store in New York State, was closed a few years after his death. However, the Ginsberg name remains legendary in the region.

Peddlers learned quickly to plot courses for friendly households, little havens where homesteaders would let them stay the night in return for goods from the pack. In those day, inns were off-limits to "Hebrews."

The barn at the Ross Farm, in the hills near Blue Mountain Lake, was a welcome shelter to Zip Coon on many a cold night.

And the missus at the Cox farm in Keene would let Moses Ginsberg spend the night in her kitchen in front of a wood-burning stove; sometimes, she would wash his blistered feet in a basin of hot water and alum.

And there was the Cash homestead on Bloomingdale Road, poor German immigrant farmers, who let young Moses Cohen sleep in the guest-room and often kept his stock for safekeeping.

Mrs Cash also taught Cohen to read and write English. And even when he had given up peddling and had opened a hardware store in Bloomingdale and later in Old Forge, he continued to send Mrs Cash $25 a month for the rest of her life.

Another welcoming household – this time a Jewish one – was the home of Isaac Feinberg in Franklin Falls, 25 miles north of Lake Placid. This was a favorite meeting place for Jewish peddlers. And it was here, in 1879, that a makeshift two rooms in the Feinberg house was turned into the first synagogue in the Adirondacks.

In 1898, Feinberg moved to Lake Placid, bringing the Torah scrolls and a small congregation with him. Lake Placid was already growing into a fashionable tourist destination. And it was this same congregation that five years later financed and erected the Adirondack's first synagogue.

By the turn of the century, Jewish communities were establishing themselves in the region. In Lake Placid, there were 20 families, with considerably more in the surrounding area – thanks to the booming tuberculosis "cure" industry in the nearby village of Saranac Lake.

Many Jews were among the thousands that came for the clear mountain air and some stayed on – even though it was only spiritual health that could be improved in the Adirondacks.

The real cure for TB didn't come until half a century later with the discovery of penicillin. In the backwoods lumber town of Tupper Lake, there were 35 Jewish families. Tupper Lake's Synagogue, Beth Joseph, also known as "The Peddlers' Synagogue" was built in 1905.

Today, Beth Joseph is the oldest surviving synagogue in the region - and it remains a beautiful building, lovingly restored and the recipient of national historic recognition – but, except for a few summer residents, its congregation has gone.

It now stands as a museum and monument to early Jewish life in the Adirondacks. Meanwhile, Lake Placid Synagogue and its congregation continues to thrive, despite the fact it has changed premises thrice in its history. The current synagogue building dates back to 1959.

The word miracle keeps coming up in reference to this Jewish community's 120th anniversary. Yet the miracle is not without irony.

This oldest and only remaining Jewish congregation in the Adirondacks has grown up on the doorstep of one of the most notorious bastions of anti-Semitism in the United States.

The Lake Placid Club was the brainchild of Melvil Dewey, inventor of a library cataloging system that bears his name. Dewey was a man with an unshakable conviction in the correctness of his own ideas.

His vision for the Lake Placid Club was a kind of backwoods university, where the "country's best" could exchange ideas in the comfort of a plush wilderness resort.

Dewey's perception of the country's best, however, took the form of blatant racism. Circulars and one grossly worded paragraph in the club's literature shocked many. It stated: "No one will be received as a member or guest against whom there is a physical, moral, social or race objection ...

"This invariable rule is rigidly enforced: it is found impracticable to make exceptions to Jews or others excluded, even when of unusual personal qualifications."

It went on to state: "Except as servants, negroes are not admitted."

Dewey had been New York State's head librarian since 1899, and a number of Jewish leaders in New York City and Albany considered it an outrage that an anti-Semite was on the public payroll.

In December 1904, Louis Marshall, a prominent Jewish civil-rights lawyer and one of the founding fathers in the wilderness preservation of what is now Adirondack State Park, led a campaign for Dewey's dismissal. In February 1905, Dewey resigned.

Marshall, who also owned a summer home on Lower Saranac Lake, was exultant. "I have succeeded in getting Dewey's scalp," he said. "The result is most gratifying." However, there were those, including many in the fledgling Jewish communities of the Adirondacks, who feared an anti-Semitic backlash.

Marshall went on: "Turning the other cheek is an exercise to which we have become accustomed by the practice of centuries. It has, however, grown somewhat monotonous." The backlash never came.

The village of Lake Placid owes much to Dewey's club for the fashionable veneer which today draws more than a million tourists each year. But to many Adirondackers, the club has always been a place apart.

Few locals ever went through its doors, except as help. Others would never go into it, shunning its snobbishness and bigotry. Throughout the history of the club and until its closure in 1980, it never altered its discrimination policy.

Several Jews, however, are known to have crossed the threshold. One of them, local shopkeeper Isadore "Pop" Urfirer, was invited by Dewey's second wife, Emily, to sell silks, satins and velvet at the club when the Guy Lombardo Orchestra visited there in the late 1920s.

It was an arrangement that continued for several years, with Urfirer's Silk Shop opening displays on the club premises on a regular basis. Much later, in the early 1950s, three well-known local Jews, including Urfirer, purchased a plot of land from the Lake Placid Club for use as a Jewish cemetery. Four years later, the ownership of that land was transferred to the synagogue. To this day, Lake Placid Jews are buried on land that once belonged to Dewey's notorious club.

It wasn't just Lake Placid. The Flume Cottage in Keene Valley advertised in 1894: "Hebrews will knock vainly for admission." And several years later, the Brightside on Raquette Lake advertised: "Hebrews need not apply."

According to Lake Placid historian Mary MacKenzie: "Anti-Semitism was across the board. No hotel in the Adirondacks admitted Jews. And it was common business practice, until after the Second World War when state discrimination laws began to be upheld."

There were, however, more disturbing concerns – especially for those who had lived through pogroms and persecutions in Eastern Europe. Around the turn of the century, the Ku Klux Klan had a strong following in the region.

And then there was the Incident at Massena, located 90 miles north of Lake Placid: a young girl disappeared on the eve of Yom Kippur.

The mayor and a state trooper led a mob to the home of Massena's rabbi with a list of questions and accusations about ritual murder. Later that day, the girl, who had been lost in the woods, turned up safe. But what if she hadn't?

Isadore Urfirer's son, Roland, now 77 and a former president of the Lake Placid synagogue, is sanguine. "The anti-Semitism of the past is not something we dwell on. The days of discrimination in hotels and resorts are long gone. We've certainly rounded the corner on that one.

"This place is a Mecca for tourists, and that's helped the synagogue. We have Jewish tourists from Canada and New York City who come to join the congregation during their vacation.

"And as for the local Jewish community, we live in religious harmony with our neighbors. We couldn't ask for a better community – both Jewish and gentile alike."

The Lake Placid congregation today maintains a cemetery, celebrates the High Holy Days, has a religious school and marks the Sabbath with services and communal meals. It's a thriving Jewish community in every sense. The local supermarket even provides a kosher-food section.

"It is miraculous," said Rabbi Alec Freedman, of Lake Placid. "We began as a small synagogue for peddlers – and although the peddlers have gone, we remain small. But the point is, we remain.

"It's no small feat to keep a synagogue and congregation going in such a remote area with such a small Jewish community.

"Quite simply, this synagogue has survived because of the determination of its congregation. That's the real miracle."

And the miracle shows no sign of abating. When the 120th anniversary celebrations are in full swing on July 29, there will, no doubt, be a toast to the next 120 years.

Finding Jewish identity

Vancouver lad near top in Israel competition

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

RAMAT GAN — "It's a great honor being here from Canada," 12½-year-old Paeir Barzilai said earlier last week. "I feel great."

Barzilai, of Vancouver, was the only Canadian finalist in the third annual International Competition on Jewish Identity, for religious and secular youth in Israel and the Diaspora. Two Torontonians also made it to the international level but did not come to Israel.

Sponsored by Bar-Ilan University's (BIU) International Centre for Jewish Identity, the Jewish Agency and the Jewish National Fund, the top four winners in the competition, which took place on May 31, won a one-year scholarship for a future year of study at BIU.

"It would've been nice if I could be in the finals," said the Vancouver Talmud Torah seventh grader. "But I'm excited to watch."

The finals took place in Ness Ziona, after all of the students met with Reuma, wife of President Ezer Weizman, at the President's House for the signing of an International Jewish Youth Congress Declaration.

"I was really excited to meet with [Reuma] Weizman," a smiling Barzilai said after having his picture taken with the president's wife.

More than 130,000 students from 23 countries, including the United States, Canada, Israel, Australia, Hungary, South Africa, Peru, Ukraine, and Estonia, ranging in age from 12 to 16, registered for this year's competition. One hundred and forty made it to Israel.

The CJN wins Quebec award

MONTREAL — For the third straight year, The Canadian Jewish News garnered a first place award at a recent meeting of the Quebec Community Newspapers Association (QCNA).

The CJN was judged 1998's best overall specialty publication by the QCNA, an umbrella group for about two dozen Quebec community newspapers.

The newspaper "reads excellence from front page to back and earns first place hands down," wrote judge Tom MacLean, of the Nova Scotia-based Enfield Weekly Press.

"It's nice to win," said Louise Wolman, CJN's retail advertising sales manager in Montreal. "It's nice to have peers look at your paper and recognize you."

Newspapers up for the QCNA awards were judged on the basis of "news and information, front page, editorial page, photos, advertising, layout and overall impression."

The News in Brief

CANADA

Emergency Meeting

HAMILTON — An emergency meeting was held here recently to address a $100,000 shortfall in this year's United Jewish Appeal campaign. Meeting chair Stan Tick warned that the shortfall is just the tip of the iceberg, as the $100,000 only reflects a decrease from the 1998 campaign, which itself was well below that of previous drives.

ISRAEL

Russian Immigration Up

JERUSALEM — Russian immigration to Israel is up by 116 percent during the first quarter of 1999, according to the Jewish Agency for Israel. Some 7,933 Russian Jews immigrated to Israel in the first three months of the year, compared with 3,673 during the same period in 1998. About 30 percent of 1,054 immigrants surveyed by the Jewish Agency cited anti-Semitism as one of the main reasons for their move, an increase from nine percent in a similar survey conducted before Russia's economic crisis began last August. Overall, 16,389 immigrants from the former Soviet Union arrived in the Jewish state in the first quarter. Some 13,336 did so during the same period in 1998.

Israeli Expansion

JERUSALEM — Israeli police forcibly dispersed Israeli and Palestinian demonstrators protesting against Jewish housing construction in the eastern Jerusalem neighborhood of Ras al-Amud. The site, owned by Miami developer Irving Moskowitz, has become a flash point for tensions over Jewish building in the West Bank and disputed parts of Jerusalem.

No Reform Recognition

JERUSALEM — Israel's Orthodox establishment will not recognize Reform Judaism despite a set of principles North American Reform rabbis recently passed endorsing the movement's adoption of some traditional practices. Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau said there is "no basis for dialogue" between the Reform movement and the Chief Rabbinate, which has a monopoly over life-cycle events in the Jewish state, until Reform Jews adopt the Orthodox interpretation of Jewish law. At the same time, Rabbi Lau said the move by the Reform movement "should be welcomed."

Deri Launches Appeal

JERUSALEM — The leader of Israel's Orthodox Shas Party last week filed an appeal with the Supreme Court to overturn his conviction and four-year jail sentence for accepting bribes while serving in the Interior Ministry. Aryeh Deri argued that the judges who convicted him were biased and had based their verdict on circumstantial evidence. Meanwhile, Prime Minister-elect Ehud Barak reiterated his desire to include Shas in his governing coalition.

WORLD

Zhirinovsky Loses

MOSCOW — Vladimir Zhirinovsky, the Russian ultranationalist known for his anti-Semitic rhetoric, lost an election for governor in a rural region in southwestern Russia. This month's vote in the Belgorod region gave Zhirinovsky less than 18 percent of the vote, which placed him third in the race won by the region's incumbent governor. Recent opinion polls show that Zhirinovsky's Liberal Democratic Party may not reach the five percent threshold necessary to gain representation in the Duma, Russia's lower house of parliament, in elections scheduled for December. The party currently has 51 deputies in the 450-seat house.

Police Remove Crosses

WARSAW — Polish police removed some 300 crosses last week from outside the former Auschwitz death camp. Despite a year-long protest by Israel and Jewish groups, a 26-foot cross will remain. The police action came a week before Pope John Paul II begins a trip to his homeland during which he will stress religious tolerance.

New Community Centre

BUENOS AIRES — Argentine Jews recently inaugurated a new community centre to replace the AMIA building where 86 people were killed five years ago in a bombing that remains unsolved. The new building is a monument that "reminds us of our mission's deepest sense: to honor life and constantly exercise memory," AMIA president Oscar Hansman told hundreds of onlookers.

Lawyers for Survivors Want $25 Million

WASHINGTON — Lawyers who represented Holocaust survivors in a class action lawsuit against Swiss banks are requesting $25 million in legal fees for their role in last year's $1.25-billion settlement.

But any decision regarding fees must be approved by the federal judge in New York who served as an arbiter between the banks and Jewish representatives.

The issue of legal fees has been a source of contention between the lawyers and groups such as the World Jewish Congress, which says it opposes anyone profiting from the Holocaust.

While many of the two dozen lawyers worked on the case for no fee, a few have applied for fees, citing financial burdens.

The court overseeing the settlement, meanwhile, has ordered a major advertising campaign to begin later this month to notify all possible beneficiaries in the United States about how to apply for payments from the settlement. The administrative costs for the campaign will come out of the settlement.

Unlike the humanitarian fund of nearly $200 million set up by Switzerland in 1997 to provide payments to needy Holocaust survivors, the $1.25-billion settlement is intended as restitution for those who lost assets in the Holocaust.

Three Jewish MPPs head to Queen's Park

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Three Jewish MPPs – one a rookie – will head to Queen's Park following last week's provincial vote in which Premier Mike Harris' Big Blue Machine steamrolled to a second majority government.

David Caplan

Of the seven Toronto and York Region ridings with concentrations of Jewish voters or with Jewish candidates, four went to the Liberals and three to the Tories.

The only close race in the 905 region, otherwise painted blue by the Tories, was in Thornhill, where Liberal Dan Ronen is considering asking for a recount.

Thornhill, which is at least one-third Jewish, saw one of the tightest races in the province. After election night, the numbers indicated that Conservative Tina Molinari had beaten Ronen 19,684 votes to 19,237, a difference of just 447 votes. New Democrat Nathan Rotman polled 1,443 ballots.

But a counting error at one poll discovered the next day showed a different picture. According to Ronen, the numbers were 19,578 for Molinari, and 19,235 for him – a margin of 343 votes.

"We will consult with party officials to decide whether to request a recount," Ronen told The CJN.

Early in the campaign, Molinari found herself on the defensive after a telephone poll asked residents whether they would be comfortable voting for a "member" of Canadian Jewish Congress and the son of a Holocaust survivor. Ronen's father is an Auschwitz survivor, and his brother Moshe is president of Congress.

David Young

Ontario's Tories apologized for the questions and fired the pollster. Molinari insisted she did not commission the poll, but refused to say who did.

Ronen said he still wants to know who commissioned the poll.

In late May, two letters of support for Molinari were sent out to Jewish voters in Thornhill, one signed by lawyer John Syrtash, the other by Rabbi Solomon Domb of B'nai Shalom North Congregation.

Syrtash said the strongly worded letter bearing his name was his idea, and that about 1,000 were mailed. Pamela Pole, Rabbi Domb's assistant, told The CJN the letter under the rabbi's signature was Molinari's idea, but "she had his permission to do it."

Syrtash said the letters were probably a contributing factor in Molinari's narrow win.

Monte Kwinter

In Don Valley East, Liberal David Caplan, 34, was being hailed a giant killer for defeating Education Minister Dave Johnson. Caplan, who since 1997 held the old riding of Oriole represented by his mother Elinor for many years, got by Johnson with a 2,500-vote plurality.

Analysts said Don Valley East was probably among the very few ridings where strategic voting – casting ballots for the candidate most likely to defeat the Harris government – actually worked.

Johnson, as education minister and a former health minister, bore the brunt of many of the Tories' most contentious policies. Nurses' and teachers' associations targeted the riding in an effort to bring about his defeat.

Veteran Liberal Monte Kwinter, 68, was returned for a fifth term in the riding of York Centre, trouncing fellow Jewish candidates Roberto Hausman of the Conservatives and

Tragedy Has Struck

An extraordinary woman in our community—a 50 year old, single mother of 10 children, has tragically passed away after a serious illness.

Her modest salary as a secretary for one of our local Jewish Day Schools, allowed her to barely cover the basic family expenses, let alone the cost of expensive medical treatment and nursing care.

The children have been left with about $200k in debts and no further means of financial support. Funds are required for basic necessities such as food, clothing, housing and Jewish education.

The family desperately wants to stay together, with the older children taking on the responsibility of raising and ultimately marrying off the younger ones and themselves.

We appeal to you to support our community's efforts to establish a trust fund for these children. All cheques over $10 will receive charitable tax receipts. In the spirit of Jewish compassion and generosity at this holiday time, please open your hearts and donate generously. Thank you.

From the editor's desk

In keeping with The CJN's determination to encourage young people to stretch their creativity and their imaginations, two weeks ago in this space I wrote about the fifth volume of Dorot, an annual journal of contemporary Jewish literature organized by post-secondary school students, for post-secondary school students.

This week I write about the creative works of our younger students.

For the past few years, it has been the pleasure of The CJN to publish some of the winning entries in the annual creative writing contest sponsored by Toronto's Board of Jewish Education (BJE).

The BJE, founded in 1949, is the central community agency for Jewish education in the Greater Toronto Area. Funded by UJA Federation, it provides a variety of important services to its affiliated schools, of which there are now more than 50, benefiting more than 17,000 students and 1,300 educators.

The creative writing contest, coordinated at the BJE by Joyce Levine, director of Interschool Programming and Pedagogic Services, attracts submissions from students in all grades, one through high school. There are categories for both Hebrew and English.

This year, we feature two of the "winning" poems.

The Generation After The Holocaust

We stroll into the auditorium as usual, laughing and talking
It is just another assembly
Nothing is different.

Some girl says a poem,
something to do with death and destruction.
We do not understand and neither does she.
We all talk.

An old woman slowly and painfully stands up,
She walks towards the microphone,
the burden and pain of worlds
on her old, stooped shoulders.
Her eyes scan the crowd.
She does not want to be here,
but some invisible force brought her here,
and is keeping her steady.

We stand and sit mechanically under the watchful gaze of our teachers.
We turn curious eyes onto the woman
Maybe this will get interesting.

She stands alone on the platform, alone in the world.
Her face is old and torn with pain.
She must go on. They must know.
We will bear it in honor and pride.

The old woman walks back to her seat.
Her gait is a little lighter.
She has taken off some of burden and placed it on our shoulders.

We all stand immediately in pure silence and respect.
Her body is disregarded,
and it is her soul we see.
She is a great woman.

Her held held high, she sits down.
Her obligation is fulfilled.
They will not forget.
We will not forget.

Deadlock in negotiations likely over: Peace Now

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Prime Minister-elect Ehud Barak intends to break the deadlock in the peace process, says Galia Golan, a founder of Peace Now.

In an interview, she expressed confidence that Barak will restart talks with the Palestinians and Syria.

The May 17 Israeli election was not only a repudiation of Benjamin Netanyahu, the incumbent, but a signal from the electorate that the peace process should be resumed, said Golan, an American who settled in Israel in 1966.

Galia Golan

Golan, a professor of Russian and East European studies at the Hebrew University, urged Barak to implement the 1998 Wye memorandum, frozen by Netanyahu, as a confidence-building measure, and to move on to final status negotiations with the Palestinian Authority.

The Palestinians, she warned, will resist a final peace agreement with Israel unless they receive at least 90 percent of the West Bank, and still more land in the Gaza Strip than they already possess.

Turning to a related topic, Golan said Peace Now has no problem with the Labor party's demand that no foreign Arab army or armies should be stationed west of the Jordan River.

She called on Barak to stop Jewish settlers in the West Bank from expanding existing settlements and engaging in unauthorized land grabs.

In the past six months, defiant settlers have seized some 19 hilltops in a bid to establish facts on the ground. These outposts should be cleared of settlers, she advised.

As well, the government should put an end to two controversial construction projects in contested eastern Jerusalem, Har Choma and Ras al-Amud.

Peace Now, however, believes that Jerusalem should remain undivided under Israel's administration, and that the capital of a future Palestinian state should be in Abu Dis, just outside Jerusalem's current borders.

Predicting that Jewish settlements in the West Bank will pose an enormous problem for Barak's peacemaking efforts, Golan said that the government should assist settlers move back to Israel.

It would be surprising if Barak does not shift funds from West Bank settlements to Israeli development towns, where Shas, the Sephardi haredi party, made major gains.

The Labor party, she observed, must respond to that segment of the have-not Sephardi population.

Golan, here under the auspices of Canadian Friends of Peace Now to deliver a speech on last month's election, has no doubt that Barak will agree to resume talks with Syria at the point they broke off in 1996.

Barak, she said, will withdraw from the Golan as part of an accord with Syria on southern Lebanon.

Rejecting suggestions that Barak and Netanyahu are policy clones, Golan maintained that they do, in fact, have major differences.

Barak is a security-minded Labor Zionist whose pragmatism embraces the idea of partition, "though that doesn't mean he won't be hard-headed and even hawkish on certain issues."

Netanyahu, by contrast, was not a pragmatist, and never intended to make concessions to the Arabs, she commented.

Peace Now, she disclosed, will mount vigils and demonstrations on behalf of peace, so that settlers and their supporters do not have the field to themselves.

Sandler sets out agenda

Federation names president

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It was out with the old and in with the new, as the UJA Federation switched leaders at its annual meeting last week.

Alan Sandler took over as president of the UJA Federation from Joseph (Joey) Steiner in an unopposed election, held at the Atkinson campus of the Associated Hebrew Day Schools.

Setting out his agenda, Sandler said, "Jewish family education spread across the entire spectrum of Jewish education facilities must be accelerated...Time is of the essence."

Services for the "Jewish vulnerable, especially the elderly," remain a key focus for the federation. "We need to link chaplaincy services and synagogues to the frail elderly who have become homebound," he said.

Citing the "high correlation between a Jewish identity and identification with Israel," Sandler said "a massive inflow of funds supporting an Israel experience for every young person in this community will forge this relationship."

He also suggested that sending teachers to Israel would "increase their passion" in the classroom.

The incoming president closed his remarks with a reference to the patriarch Abraham, who rushed out of his tent to welcome three strangers.

"We must rush forward to the hesitant stranger. We must welcome them in. We must create that sense of community, that sense that no one is ever left out," he said.

Reflecting on his two-year stint as president of the federation, Steiner said he went into the job with the intention of "enhancing the quality of Jewish life here and overseas."

Alan Sandler

He called Toronto's Israel at 50 celebrations "unequalled anywhere in the world except for Israel," bringing "diverse elements of the community together."

During his term as president, ground was broken for a new CHAT high school; the Bathurst Jewish Centre, rescued from near bankruptcy by a federation bailout, has re-emerged as a key community facility; the Bloor Jewish Community Centre has remained the major focus of the downtown community; and the federation is actively seeking a new site for a Jewish student centre at the University of Toronto, he said.

Earlier, David Engel gave a brief description of the federation's finances, saying last year's fundraising campaign is projected to reach $40.5 million. The campaign enjoyed "a quantum leap in giving" – a jump of $4 million in one year. That total leaves the federation on target for its goal of $50 million, he said.

Turning to the endowment fund, Engel said it has grown to $55 million in the last two years, including a jump of $6 million in the last two months.

No financial documents were released at the annual meeting.

In other business, federation spokespersons paid tribute to Jehudi Kinar, who is winding up a four-year posting as Israeli consul-general to Toronto and western Canada.

Kinar responded with a heartfelt speech in which he credited his wife, Ruti, "for always being there," and in which he described the Toronto Jewish community as "warm and hospitable."

Kinar, who served in San Francisco before being posted to Toronto, said for a community of its size, Toronto remains "unified." He said he hoped to see "more tolerance in Toronto outside the framework of UJA Federation, and not just when it concerns Israel."

In other business, Harry Gorman was honored with the Ben Sadowski Award of Merit for his work as a community volunteer, while Peter Ekstein received the Phil Granovsky Award for Campaign Excellence.

Recipients of the Shem Tov Award for excellence in volunteer service were: Sandra Atlin, Richard Cummings, Igor Korenzvit, Sydney Loftus, Marilyn Raphael, Lawrence Smith, and Edith Sobel.

Tammy Anklewicz and Bruce Leboff received the Leadership Development Awards.

UJA Federation Funwalk draws about 15,000

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Some 15,000 people made the trek from Nathan Phillips Square to Ontario Place – walking, in-line skating, or riding in strollers and wagons – as participants in UJA Federation's Israel Funwalk '99.

One of the highlights of the funwalk, which offered entertainment for all age groups – inflatables for jumping for the very young, karaoke and plenty of live music – was the participation of Steven Page, the lead singer of the Bare Naked Ladies, one of the hottest rock groups in North America.

His fans screamed and cheered, when he entered Nathan Phillips Square. The Toronto-born Page kicked off the walkathon by singing both O Canada and Hatikvah.

He later told The CJN that he was glad to be involved in a Jewish community event. "A lot of people don't know that I'm Jewish, he said." Much to their delight page, Page posed with several young fans for pictures once the walk got under way.

Other local celebrities on hand for the walk were CFRB radio food show hosts Avrum Rosensweig and Marty Galin, who were the MCs of the festival stage at Ontario Place and Adrienne Gold, host of the fashion television show, Images.

The route of the walk wound through the Spadina-College area, which was the centre of Jewish Life in Toronto in the early decades of this century. A klezmer band played at the old Kiever shul, a renovated synagogue in the heart of Kensington Market.

Marchers were escorted by the police as well as the YOWIES (Yidden on Wheels), a Jewish motorcycle club. Arthur Geller, 74, who said he was the oldest person to be riding a Harley Davidson, told The CJN he was attending the funwalk for his grandson.

The walk culminated with a kosher barbecue and an afternoon of musical entertainment at the festival stage at Ontario Place. Many of the youngsters capped off the day by cooling off in the water park.

Walk organizers estimate that about $200,000 was raised by the walk.

Corey Mandell, who co-chaired the walk with Harvey Cooperberg and Fran Grundman, told The CJN that the turnout was terrific, and with the great weather and the commitment of the volunteers, Funwalk '99 was one of "best days ever in the history of this annual community event."

CORRECTIONS

The story on the 1999 National Bible contest (CJN, June 3) contained the following inaccuracies:

Grades 7 and 8 winners – Shalom Naumann and Leah Breslow tied for second place; it was reported that Shalom was second and Leah third.

Supplementary school winners – Jeffrey Heifetz tied for second, not third place. Further, the supplementary students were in grades 5 to 8, not grades 5 to 7 as reported.

The event was jointly sponsored by the Jewish Education Council of Montreal, the Board of Jewish Education of Toronto, the Canadian Zionist Federation and the Jewish National Fund.

Harris' opportunity

Forty-five percent of Ontario's voters last week returned Mike Harris and his Progressive Conservative party to the government benches in the Legislature at Queen's Park with approximately 57 percent of the seats in the Legislative Assembly (59 of 103). We congratulate Premier Harris and his colleagues for their victory, the first such back-to-back majority victories in Ontario in some 30 years.

Indeed, we congratulate all the individuals, winners and losers, who stood as candidates in the election. Running for office demands tremendous sacrifice. In the partisan tumult of an election campaign, the public rarely sees the high personal cost, the many private heartbreaks and hardships that vote-seekers inevitably experience in the tiring house-to-house and telephone stumping that is both the chief burden and the chief glory of our electoral system.

But now the campaign is over.

The people of Ontario have clearly and fairly chosen. The order and expectation of the day is good government. And there is a great deal of work to be done.

We and the public will be vigilantly watching as the newly elected government tackles Ontario's pressing issues: repairing the health-care system; restoring confidence at all levels of the educational system – elementary, secondary and post-secondary; infusing balance and compassion to the delivery of community, social and welfare services; stewarding the economy through any future global buffetings; eliminating the annual budgetary operating deficit, and reducing the cumulative debt.

We will also be watching as the newly elected government responds to its strongly implied campaign promise to provide equal funding for non-educational, health and related support services to all children in Ontario's non-Catholic, independent schools.

Though it seems that Premier Harris completed his wide-sweeping, structural, social and fiscal reforms in his first term of office, he undoubtedly still has plans for additional policy reforms and legislative initiatives in his second term of office.

Among the reforms the premier may still have on his agenda, we respectfully suggest that he add the reform of public example. He has a wonderful opportunity now to steer public behavior as well as public policy.

To the notion of "common sense" that he assiduously planted over four years in the public mind and onto the public agenda, he should now add the notion of common kindness, common civility, common goodness, common generosity.

The way to do this is for the premier to publicly demonstrate his personal rejection of "mean, lean and nasty" as a governing ethos.

A good first step in this direction would be for Premier Harris to symbolically toss into the garbage bins of history, along with the worn, faded streamers and torn political posters, the disquieting, cynicism-inducing, negative attack postures of the just-concluded election campaign.

The premier's example would surely be followed by his colleagues in the Legislature and then by other public figures in other positions of public trust and responsibility. That single change in behavior would have as long-lasting and beneficial an impact on the quality of life in Ontario, and perhaps beyond, as any economic or other governmental policy change he and his cabinet might implement.

In all its deliberations over the next four years, we wish the government good luck and good judgment.

WISDOM OF THE AGES

News about the porthole girls on the St. Louis

Re "Remembering the St. Louis" (CJN, May 13): The name of the two girls looking out of the porthole, in the picture, was Spanier and they were twins from Germany. After the ordeal they were taken in with their parents by Holland and sent to the refugee camp Westerbork.

The father, Dr. Fritz Spanier, became head of the medical staff. After the invasion of Holland by Germany, Westerbork became a concentration camp under SS command and Dr. Spanier became the Lagerarzt. The family stayed in Westerbork until liberation. After the liberation, Spanier was asked by the Canadian Army, medical branch, to form a medical team to go the British Zone to treat survivors of the camps. That group was stationed for a while in Bergen-Belsen.

Mrs. Spanier and the girls went to Amsterdam and emigrated from there to the United States. The last I heard, the two girls lived in New York City.

Only after the German captain threatened to ram the St. Louis onto the Scottish coast, did Britain convince Holland, Belgium and France to agree to split the passengers between them.

Some historians have claimed it was the scare of the oil spoiling the coastline of Great Britain that motivated them to allow some of the refugees to land, not the fate that would await them in Germany.

Barak did not win in a landslide

It has been reported that Ehud Barak won the recent election in a landslide. I find this strange considering that there was only a six to seven percent shift of the electorate from the previous election. Not a huge number at all.

It also behooves us to look at the Jewish vote (not that I wish to disenfranchise Arab Israeli citizens – but obviously, we must be concerned with Israel as a Jewish State). If we temporarily extract the Arab votes, which comprise about 10 percent of the total vote, and which were certainly overwhelmingly for Barak, we can focus on the Jewish response. Now we find that Barak won by a margin of two percent – 46 percent to 44 percent – no landslide by my calculation! On the other hand, in the previous election, Benjamin Netanyahu garnered 51 percent to Peres' 39 percent of the Jewish vote. Netanyahu had a 12 percent plurality of the Jewish vote. He did not just squeeze in!

At least I am comforted to see that Barak did have a majority of the Jewish votes – even if it was small – and that national policy is not decided by the Arab vote. Of course, that will only be the case if Barak does not make his coalition dependent on the 10 Arab party seats.

National Bible Contest augurs well for future

All of us associated with the recent National Bible Contest were very pleased to read the write-up in The CJN (May 27).

In the spirit of hakarat hatov, we believe it is important to give recognition to all of the sponsoring organizations, without whose support this annual educational event could not take place. Along with the Jewish Education Council, the longtime sponsors are the Toronto Board of Jewish Education, the Canadian Zionist Federation, the Jewish National Fund of Canada, and a new sponsor this year, Shalom-K Tours.

A development that is very gratifying to the educators and organizers is the increasing involvement of recent graduates of the Bible Contest and of our day schools. In addition to Carolyn Gehr, we mention, in particular, Shawn Zelig Aster, Ron Wald and Deborah Abecassis, who served as judges and presenters, as well as several university students who led workshops. This surely augurs well for the future.

Virtual centre for research at Technion

Re: Peter Munk Article (CJN, May 27).

It stated that the money raised in honor of Mr. Munk will be used "to build" the Peter Munk Centre for Research, Innovation and Technology. I wish to advise that no centre will be built, as it will be a virtual centre. All funds raised will be directed to present and future ongoing scientific research being carried out at the Technion, with funds for the research coming from the centre.

My reference with respect to the 51st anniversary was in relation to the State of Israel and not the Technion, as the university is presently marking its 75th anniversary.

It was not Peter Munk who had given the funds for a garden in front of a student dormitory, but rather Nicholas and Hedy Munk who donated the gardens.

Yiddish fabulist had an original view of the universe

By BARUCH COHEN

Fables are considered the domain of Aesop, LaFontaine and Krylov, but the genre also has a tradition in Jewish literature.

In Hebrew, we have the parable of the trees who seek a king (Judges 9-8-16) and the rich man-poor man fable with which the prophet Nathan admonishes King David after the Bathsheba episode (Samuel 1:12:1-4). King Solomon is supposed to have known 3,000 fables (Kings 1:5:12-13), none of which the Bible cites. However, the Talmud does record some animal fables.

In the Middle Ages, Hebrew was enriched by the fables of Berechiah (circa 1300) who, with his volume For Fables, containing 119 animal fables, established himself as one of the leading fabulists of the medieval period. Although fables were written in Hebrew and Yiddish in the interim, it was not until the 20th century that Jewish literature had another superb writer of fables, this time one who wrote in Yiddish.

Yiddish poet Eliezer Steinbarg (1880-1932), was a writer of children's fables, songs and stories, and a noted Hebrew-Yiddish educator. His fables resemble classical European fables, but with his use of traditional Hebrew literary material, Yiddish folklore and expression, and the ethics of Yiddishkeit, they become Jewish. Steinbarg's mastery lies in his skilful use of the nuances of Yiddish, his inventiveness and sensitivity to sounds, his comic playfulness, his surprising rhymes, and his characterizations.

Yiddish poetry was affected – always – by differences in regional sensibility. Romania, one of the richest repositories of Yiddish folklore, birthplace of Yiddish theatre and cabaret, also brought forth two great neo-folk poets, Steinbarg and Itzik Manger. It is obvious how much Steinbarg's poetic fables owe to Jewish fabular and midrashic literature. As for Manger – who wrote under the name of Itzik, rather than Itzhak – he candidly shaped his poems and ballads from the material of the Aggadah and earlier folk bards and singers.
